

Tewee returns to varsity squad

Isaiah Tewee is one of a number of Madras High School basketball players who is returning this season to the varsity squad.

The good number of returning varsity players is one reason why Madras can expect to have a good basketball season again this year, said Tewee.

Coach Evan Brown agrees. "We played a lot of sophomores last year," he said.

"We're still a young team, but we do have several varsity players returning from last year."

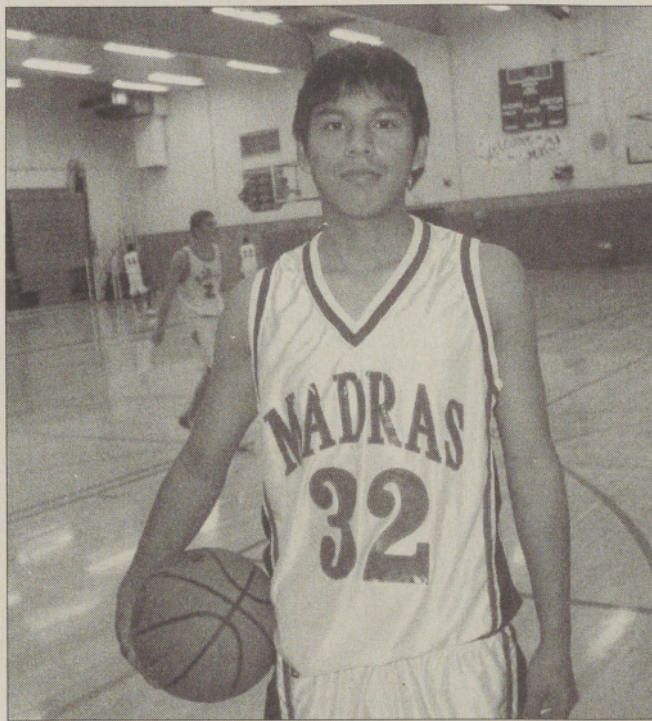

Tewee is a junior this year. He plays point guard. Last year as a sophomore, Tewee began the season on the junior varsity squad.

Partway into the season, though, he moved up to varsity, and started some of the remaining games, including some of the post-season competition.

The White Buffalos basketball team last year was second in the league.

They made it to the state tournament, and played in the quarter finals.

The team made a similar impressive performance the year before.

"I think we have a good team this year," said Tewee, "because of the number of returning players."

As the 2002-03 basketball season is getting under way, Tewee is recovering from a knee injury. He expects to be fully recovered a short time after the season begins.

Tewee is one of two Native Americans on the varsity team. Also on the White Buffalo squad is Kevin Hernandez, who is a Pueblo Indian.

River: permit opponents have economic stake

On this segment of the Deschutes, where management goals seek to minimize encounters with other people, target levels may have exceeded more than 20 times.

"The tribes went to the legislature in 1984 and tried to get something done, which led to this process," said Henrickson. "Tribal members were being harassed away from the river and they wanted to do something about it. The tribes have been unrelenting in their position and they're not going to go away. They're not going to change their minds about how the river should be used."

Opponents of the permit system say the trend in boater use is downward. They believe the targets could be reached in the years ahead without putting absolute restrictions on the number of daily users. Suggestions to reach compliance included more analysis, revision of the user targets, amending the plan, modifying river segment boundaries, doing away with annual passes and charging everyone the daily fee, and strategizing other ways to distribute use.

Federal and state representatives emphasized they are not going back on their commitment to reach the targets, but none outside of the BIA want to impose a permit system. They said they would be willing to work harder to reach the targets and they just want a couple more years to prove their sincerity.

"If I take this back to Tribal Council they'll say this is the same decision we had in 1993 and '94 and '95 and every other year," said Brunoe. "Tribal Council has pretty much given up on this group."

Brunoe said he would write a letter to the executive board and ask for their direction on the permit system in general, and on the tribal proposal to implement a pilot permit system in 2004. The executive board is convened to make decisions when the Lower Deschutes River Managers fail to reach consensus.

Many opponents of the permit system were apparently frustrated by the Confederated Tribes' persistence. They use the boater numbers compiled by the Bureau of Land Management to point out positive trends and question the tribe's insistence to impose strict regulations.

Some believe minor alterations in accounting will bring the numbers into compliance. Others say the numbers are almost impossible to read, because once a boater has left a launch site it's very difficult to track them downstream, making it appear as though there are too many people within a particular segment when they are actually somewhere else.

Tribal representatives said they are tired of playing a numbers game. User data has been compiled by the state of Oregon, Bureau of Land Management, Oregon State University, and a private contractor. All of the numbers indicate targets are being exceeded and gathering new numbers won't change anything.

Brunoe and Henrickson said the Confederated Tribes are tired of waiting. The plan called for a permit system to be implemented in 1996 if targets were not being reached. Every year the targets are exceeded and every year the managers ask for an extension, stating the numbers are unreliable or they don't see the need to limit access.

Members of the audience were allowed to comment at the end of the meeting. There was some support for the tribal proposal, but most of the comments were pointedly against the permit system. There were numerous suggestions that the managers group should do what's right for the resource, but oddly enough the majority of those who spoke out against a permit system have an economic stake in the matter.
