The Confederated Tribes of Warm Springs

Leadership and the Future.

For as long as our people can remember, Tsagiglalal — "she who watches" — has kept a protective eye on the tribes of the mid-Columbia and Great Basin. She watched as Lewis and Clark arrived in 1805, welcomed and assisted by our ancestors. And she watches today, as our people cooperate with neighboring communities to build a better economic future.

J.P. Patt and Rudy Clements know it's their responsibility to watch over and lead our people. As two of our tribal leaders, J.P. and Rudy find inspiration in our past to guide our destiny. They value sustainable practices that balance the use and protection of our life-giving natural resources. J.P. and Rudy also understand the value of sharing with our neighboring communities, and supported agreements donating some of our water rights to help sustain our neighbors' farms and cities.

Now, J.P., Rudy and other tribal leaders are working with Governor Ted Kulongoski to address the harsh realities of poverty on our reservation. New economic development initiatives and cooperative projects will create jobs, resulting in the economic self sufficiency all Oregonians desire.

J.P., Rudy and Governor Kulongoski know that tough times demand a watchful eye, inspirational leadership and our best efforts to create success for our families and for future generations in Oregon. And that's exactly the results they intend to accomplish in the months ahead.
