Kah-Nee-Ta at near full employment

Kah-Nee-Ta is coming to the end of its busy season, and nearly all the different departments and areas of the resort have enough workers to finish out the summer, said Margie Tuckta, of the Kah-Nee-Ta Human Resources Department.

Employment at the resort is very seasonal. During the summer, Kah-Nee-Ta employs close to 370 people. This figure drops by about 100 during the off-season.

The end of the season at the resort is Labor Day, which is just around the corner. That the resort has just two available jobs is good news in that it means the employees who have been hired this year have worked out well.

Of the total number of employees at the resort and casino, about one-third are tribal member employees.

There are 367 employees at the resort, and 117 are tribal member employees. These figures were as of July of this year. The fields of work at the resort range from the gift shop, front desk, dining room and kitchen, banquets, lounge, casino custodial, slots, table games, security, cage, reservations, housekeeping, spa, among many other types of employment at Kah-Nee-Ta.

Student traveler meets interesting friends

When you travel from one place to another, you can't help but notice the variety of people. It's amazing. Whether you're traveling from town to town or from state to state, there is always some unique characteristic about the people.

I noticed the differences of my friends in Oregon, Colorado and Maine. They are all good friends but in different ways.

In Oregon most of my friends are athletic and they speak their mind. If someone is doing something they don't like, they don't hesitate to say something. They don't really have manners and that doesn't bother me at all. I am from the same place and I don't have any manners either.

My friends at Outward Bound in Colorado come from different states. The most polite people I have met are from North Carolina. Everyone I know from that state is very entertaining and polite. Whenever they ask for something they say "please," and if they get it, they say "thank you." The best thing about them is they are always friendly to everybody. They always have a smile on their face and a hand reaching out to meet new people.

At Outward Bound in Colorado when you make your first friend, he or she is probably going to be your good friend, or the one you will hang out with most of the time. For me it was my roommate during my first year.

It was hard going to a new place and being all alone on turf I wasn't used to. But once I made friends I began to have the time of my life.

I remember when I met Ysela Lopez, my roommate that first year. I had been in our room for a long time rearranging things and putting them away. When she came in with her stuff, I looked at her and said, "Hello my name is Spud and I am from Oregon." She looked at me with a weird expression on her face and said, "Spud?" as if to ask if that was really my name. We got to talking and realized we were not much different.

I spent a large amount of time with her my first year and she made me feel safe. She made me feel that even though I was not around my family or friends I still had someone, and it was better to have a semi-stranger for a friend than no one at all.

It was very easy to make friends in Colorado. It is actually very hard not to. You meet so many new people and you're around them so much, not knowing their name or face would be impossible. Everyone is friendly and outgoing. It is a group of very talented students and when they are all pull together they can do great things.

On the other hand it is very hard to make any friends in Winter Harbor, Maine. I have been here for a little over a week and I don't really know anybody from this town. Winter Harbor is a very small town. Its first big restaurant just opened up and there's a five-and-dime in town, but not many places for teenagers to hang out. That makes it hard for me to meet people my own age.

I have met some cool people a lot older than me just by going around town and doing community things such as attending dances, going to the store, eating out, and going places with my aunt.

People skills are the most important things you will need in life, because meeting people is what makes friends, and friends are the best thing in the world. They will help you through tough times and be there for you when you need them.
