Rare white calf born on northern Arizona ranch

PHOENIX, Ariz. (AP) - The owners of a small bison herd in northern Arizona were surprised to find one of their rare white buffalo had given birth to something even rarer: a white calf.

It's a 1-in-10 million occurrence, Keith Davis, a spokesman for Spirit Mountain Ranch, said of Saturday's birth. "This is so rare specifically because she was born white," Davis said. "The others were born red (like normal buffalo) and turned white."

The birth of a white bison is meaningful for many American Indian tribes who consider it a symbol of rebirth when the world's people are in troubled times. None of the bison is albino but rather a mutation of the usual fur color of dark brown to black, said Dena Riley, who owns the ranch near Flagstaff with her husband.

Of 11 bison on the ranch, four are white, not including the newborn.

The ranch was moved onto its 5acre site near the San Francisco Peaks in December 2001 and has had visitors from around the globe to see white bison, according to Dena Riley.
