Bridge project on hold after discovery of possible Indian site

BELLINGHAM, Wash. (AP) - A bridge project that officials plan to use as a key link in redeveloping Bellingham's waterfront has been put on hold because of the discovery of possible Indian settlement remains.

Seashells were found during drilling that is part of preliminary engineering work for the project to build a bridge along Laurel Street, Public Works Director Dick McKinley said.

The shells could be part of a midden - a heap of shells such as those that commonly accumulated around ancient settlements where people ate lots of clams and other mollusks. Federal law protects such sites, which can also contain the bones of ancient inhabitants.

City officials hope to begin building the bridge next year, to maintain access to the waterfront while other bridges are replaced so railroad tracks can be relocated. The presence of an ancient village site with human remains could stop the project.

For now, more research will be done to determine whether the shells are part of a midden.
