

Wi$eUp teaches financial stability

By Leslie Mitts

Women throughout the community recently had a chance to learn about finances during a workshop that paired KWSO with various organizations.

In order to bring the message of financial stability to women throughout reservations and rural communities in the western U.S., the U.S. Department of Labor collaborated with Native Public Media, an organization who oversees more than 30 public radio stations on tribal land.

The purpose of Native Public Media is to "promote healthy, engaged, independent native communities by strengthening and expanding Native American media capacity."

To meet those initiatives, the organizations worked with KWSO to air various public service announcements about reducing debt and increasing savings and investments.

The workshop, called "Wi$eUp," stems from a project out of the Women's Women had the chance to discuss methods of financial success with the workshop.

Bureau San Francisco office, and provides information to native women in locations served by Native public radio stations.

The public service announcements were created using the voices of native women who participated in a month-long session of classes in Arizona.

The announcements reflect the experiences of native women who want to strengthen their lives and their families by understanding money, savings and investments.

Topics of discussion included understanding credit scores, planning and saving, understanding financial literacy, money management and balancing traditional life and finances.
