Fisherman cited in Marshall subsistence protest

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) — A city police officer in Marshall has been ticketed for illegal fishing in a summer protest of subsistence fishing restrictions. A U.S. Fish and Wildlife service protection officer on Wednesday ticketed 32-year-old

Jason Isaac, who was one of several men who boasted of illegal fishing. Nick Andrew Jr., executive director of the Ohagamuit Traditional Council in Marshall, tells The Tundra Drums that Isaac was the only one ticketed and the only one to tell investigators he fished illegally. The fishermen told reporters they had caught 100 king salmon on June 26, during a closed fishing period, and delivered the fish to widows, elders and disabled residents.

San Joaquin River, salmon restoration to begin

FRESNO, Calif. (AP) — Federal officials released the first surge of water from a Fresno-area dam to reawaken miles of the San Joaquin River and restore salmon runs that went dry in the 1940s.

The Bureau of Reclamation began the historic restoration of the state's second-largest river at 6 p.m. on Thursday, Oct. 1, when officials released pulses of water along the dry riverbed.

The project to bring back salmon to the river is a milestone in a decades-long legal tussle between environmentalists, farmers and the federal government.
