

Teens: Learning the lesson of the ancestors

One of the counselors held her hands to her face. The other elder wiped her eyes. But the teenagers had moved to the edge of the stuffy room and were standing in the doorway. Trinity was leaning against the wall, looking bored. Andrew Tsosie, 14, was texting.

"We are a strong people. We endured so much. Be proud of your past, and who you are," Ortega said. "Know where you came from and what others sacrificed for you."

The young Apache didn't seem to be listening when the elder talked about how, finally, guards let the prisoners move to the fort's top wall and erect makeshift teepees overlooking the water. They seemed unmoved when she explained that their ancestors built fires to try to make the Army rations taste more familiar.

"After two years, they put our people back on a train to take them to a fort out West," Ortega said. "But some of them didn't make it; 24 died here, of tuberculosis."

She began to talk about the children, and the teenagers looked up from the doorway. Andrew put down his phone.

"Guards ripped the children from their parents and sent them on another train, to Pennsylvania, to the Carlisle school for Indians, where they had to learn how to live in the white man's world."

"It sounded like the Holocaust. I didn't know that happened to our people, too."

The other elder, Dorene Fernando, 67, stood up and forced a slight smile. "But their prayers and their faith helped them, and if they hadn't held on, we wouldn't be here today," she said. "I tell you, their spirits are still here, making us stronger."

When the teens ran to change out of their ceremonial outfits, one of the counselors stayed behind in the arched room.

Clay Geronimo, 24, left the reservation to go to college, then returned to work in the new equine therapy program. He had noticed something on the side wall. He leaned in and saw that someone had carved a face of a man wearing a pointed hat.

"A crown dancer," gasped Geronimo, great-great-grandson of the leader. The outline was chiseled deep into the wall. The ranger had called the figure a fire spirit, but Geronimo knew it symbolized strength. It must have been a blessing, encouraging the Apache inmates to hold on.

"That took a long time," said Geronimo. He reached out and placed his right palm on the rough wall, beside the message from his ancestors, and whispered, "Thank you."

In the front of the charter bus, the two tribal elders were dozing.

The teenagers in the back were quiet. No one was taking pictures. "That made me sad," said Joe Little-Youngman, 15. "I kept thinking, what if my dad had been there? But it was also kind of exciting, I mean, that they didn't die there."

Trinity said she had never heard that part of her heritage. "It sounded like the Holocaust," she said. "I didn't know that happened to our people, too."

When the bus stopped outside a seafood restaurant, across the street from the Atlantic, all of the adults headed inside. But the teenagers lingered, looking longingly at the waves. "That's the beach, isn't it?" Tralin asked. "I want to go to the beach."

Geronimo told the other counselors he wasn't hungry, that he would take the teens to see the water.

So there on the shore near where their ancestors had suffered, on the sand those prisoners never got to tread, the young Apache kicked off their Converse, rolled up their Wranglers and, laughing, waded into the waves.
