Snowpacks mostly below normal; Deschutes okay

(AP) — Oregon's tallest peak has raked enough moisture out of passing storms to claim the only normal snowpack in the state. But the farther a river basin is from Mount Hood, the worse summertime river flows look.

The latest snowpack maps posted on the Natural Resources Conservation Service show the rangelands of the John Day, Malheur and Owyhee basins in Eastern Oregon particularly parched, with the Klamath, Goose Lake and Harney basins to the south not much better off.

The Rogue and Umpqua basins in southwestern Oregon, and Upper Deschutes and Crooked River basins in Central Oregon are mediocre. The Willamette Basin is near normal.

Like other states across the West, Oregon depends on winter snow in the mountains for the bulk of river flows in summer, when rain is rare.

Overall, the state's snowpack was at 84 percent of normal, after troublesome high pressure ridges diverted storms headed this way.

The forecasts are used by farmers to see how much irrigation water they can expect, utilities to plan for hydroelectric plant outputs, and fisheries managers for conditions facing salmon as they migrate out to sea and back upriver to spawn. Whitewater outfitters also use them to plan their rafting seasons.

The worst off basins are in the southwestern corner of the state, where the Malheur Basin is at 25 percent, and the Owyhee 30 percent.

The service's latest forecast calls for streamflows to be a little better than current snowpacks. The Deschutes was forecast to have 98 percent of normal flows, which is good news for whitewater rafters. Another whitewater river, The Rogue, was forecast for 88 percent.
