

Jamboree Day

Youngsters enjoyed the annual event, Jamboree Day, that transforms the Community Center field for a day.

As the temperature inched towards triple digits, the kids enjoyed the inflated water slide, and were able to quickly dry off so they could climb the rock wall.

Satch and Mike helped kids with their bows and arrows at the archery station while Carol, Mykee, and Tatum painted faces and arms too.

Other activities included the bouncy house and obstacle course, from the same company who have become regulars at the event the past few years.

Mobile clinic arriving soon

The tribes are expecting the arrival of the new mobile clinic as soon as next week.

A dedication ceremony will be announced when the mobile clinic arrives.

Over the past several months, the vehicle has been customized to the specifications identified by the tribes. Cost of the unit is about $300,000, funded through community healthcare programs.

The mobile clinic is a cooperative project of the Community Health Program, the Joint Health Commission, tribal Health and Human Services and the Indian Health Service.

The facility will allow health workers to visit outlying communities such as Simmasho, Seekseequa and Sidwalter. The clinic could also be used for special visits to locations like the Early Childhood Education Center.

Depending on the nature of the visit, the mobile clinic will be staffed by a physician or nurse practitioners. There will also be a dental component to the clinic.

The idea for a mobile clinic serving the reservation began about three years ago. At the time, the community was responding to the H1N1 flu outbreak. There was an imminent need to serve elders and others in the outlying communities.

Community health workers began the grant process, and secured the necessary funding.
