

Carbon sequestration moving forward

The first phase of the carbon sequestration study is complete. Natural Resources is preparing an update on the project for Tribal Council.

Phase 1 was the development of an inventory and modeling to determine the feasibility of carbon sequestration on the reservation. The next phase will be the design of a management plan for certain forest areas, said Bobby Brunoe, Natural Resources general manager.

The practice of "improved forest management" can result in carbon sequestration that can be marketed to large companies in California.

Other tribes, the Yurok and Hoopa, for instance, have recently entered the carbon sequestration market. Warm Springs Natural Resources began researching the subject in 2013, with encouragement from Tribal Council.

Carbon sequestration has the potential for new revenue to the tribes, said Brunoe.

Carbon sequestration is the process of capturing and storing atmospheric carbon dioxide, a greenhouse gas. In 2013 California implemented regulations limiting the amount of greenhouse gases that a company can emit during the year. There is flexibility in the regulation in that a company can exceed the cap limit by obtaining an allowance or an offset.

An offset means the company demonstrates that, through its initiative, an amount of carbon is being captured and stored, or sequestered, that otherwise would have gone into the atmosphere.

Philip Deloria is the Carroll Smith-Rosenberg Collegiate Professor at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, with a joint appointment in the departments of History, and American Culture. He has served as president of the American Studies Association, as a council member of the Organization of American Historians, and as a trustee of the Smithsonian's National Museum of the American Indian.
