

Lawsuit over Columbia, Snake temperatures

A planned lawsuit against the Environmental Protection Agency will claim the agency is not acting to reduce water temperatures in the Columbia and Snake rivers.

Warmer water is harmful to salmon. For instance, last year 250,000 sockeye died in the Columbia because of high temperatures.

Conservation groups said earlier this week they will sue the EPA in order to address the problem.

The agency ten years ago began determining measures to reduce water temperatures in the rivers, but the process then stalled.

The dams on the rivers, and the flows from the dams, are the controlling factors in water temperatures, according to the research.

Changes to dam operations, and removal of obsolete dams on the lower Snake could be part of a plan to manage river temperatures.
