On schools from State of Oregon

A letter sent from the Oregon Department of Education to superintendents and principals last week says there is a "very real potential" that students in the state may not return to school this academic year. The state is asking districts to have their Distance Learning for All plan in place by Monday, April 13. The state letter says:

Even from a distance, schools are encouraged to focus on student connection, on nurturing relationships with students and families, on communicating with parents and caregivers, and on providing opportunities for active collaboration between school leaders, teachers and staff.

The timeline happened as follows: In mid March the Oregon Department of Education learned that students would lose seven days of school. A week later Gov. Brown extended the closure through April 28.

Now, the Oregon Department of Education is preparing for the fact that students may not return before summer vacation.

Districts initially planned to make up the lost days in summer, but with the governor's order, the state is now adapting to provide distance learning.

"We now have a moral imperative to meet the changing nature of the pandemic and evolve our approach to serving our children," Oregon Department of Education wrote in the letter to superintendents and principals.

The department of education said it is shifting from supplementary education to a longer-term plan.

"Of course, education without face-to-face interaction between students and teachers will look and feel different and cannot be fully replicated across a distance. It will not and cannot happen overnight," the Oregon Department of Education said.

They are asking families and educators to be patient as we work to provide learning for the students.

Since the Oregon Department of Education released Distance Learning for All guidelines in the letter last week, district 509-J is developing and finalizing its plan to meet each of its school's, and the students' needs.
