Future of Dakota Access pipeline uncertain

The result of the recent U.S. Presidential election could create more headaches for the Dakota Access Pipeline's owners.

The owners are already battling legal challenges, trying to keep the main conduit running, and flowing oil out of North Dakota.

Former President Barack Obama blocked a permit that would have allowed construction under South Dakota's Lake Oahe, a critical water source for the Standing Rock Sioux tribe.

The line was finished in 2017 after President Trump, upon taking office, approved a final permit allowing construction under the lake to be completed.

In July, a U.S. district court judge threw out that permit, and ordered the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to conduct a new environmental review that is expected to take months.

Next year President-Elect Biden could bring in new Army Corps leadership.

That could increase the chances that the line would be shut. For now, the Corps has allowed DAPL to operate on federal land without a permit.

Forgotten story of only Native U.S. vice president

Charles Curtis, a member of the Kaw Nation who grew up in Kansas, became Herbert Hoover's vice president in the 1928 presidential election—the first and only Native American to hold the nation's second-highest office.

His tenure was marked with controversy that grew over the years because of his support for legislation to force Native people to assimilate into mainstream American society and leave traditional ways behind—views he would later credit to his maternal grandmother.

"The feeling in those days was, if you were going to be successful, you had to be an assimilationist," said Dakota Sioux historian Jeanne Eder Rhodes. "Pushing for Indians to join white society took the battles from the prairie and plains to the courts."

During his years in the U.S. House, Curtis, a Republican, served on the Committee on Indian Affairs, where he drafted the "Curtis Act" in 1898. This act overturned treaty rights, allotted tribal land to individuals without obtaining permission from the tribes, abolished tribal courts and gave the Secretary of the Interior the power to lease out mineral rights on tribal lands.
