State steelhead fishing closure affects tribal guides

Due to the poor returns of steelhead to the Columbia River Basin, the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife is extending steelhead fishing closures on the Deschutes River through December 31.

The current forecast for steelhead above Bonneville Dam indicates that this will be one of the lowest runs on record. ODFW said it has been monitoring the fish passing over Sherars Falls, and the Deschutes run is mirroring those elsewhere in the Columbia River Basin.

Tribal members can fish as they normally do in the Deschutes, said Mark Manion, Harvest Manager with the tribes' Branch of Natural Re-

The state rule does, however, affect the tribal fishing guides who take non-member clients for trips on the Deschutes, Mr. Manion said. Non-members would be unable to fish for steelhead but can fish for trout through October 31, Manion said.

State closure of steelhead fishing will provide protection for wild steelhead and ensure that hatchery broodstock and fish reintroduction programs needs are also met, ODFW said.

"The closure to steelhead angling implemented in September had a dramatic impact on the number of steelhead encountered by anglers as compared to recent years. Extending these closures to the entire basin will ensure protection of these iconic fish for the remainder of this run year," said Jason Seals, district biologist for the Lower Deschutes.

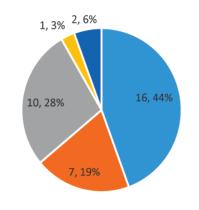

"We understand this has an impact on anglers and local communities, and it's a tough decision, but the right one in this case," continued Seals.

"We appreciate anglers understanding and support for these actions as necessary to help future generations of Deschutes steelhead."

ODFW is also closing angling for coho salmon early.
