Government identifies Native burial sites

The U.S. Department of Interior released a report last week that located 53 burial sites and more than 400 boarding schools supported by the federal government that sought to assimilate Native American children into White society. A number of the sites are in Oregon, as shown on the map.

The investigation turned up over 500 deaths, though that number could climb to the thousands or even tens of thousands. The schools were known to have operated for 150 years, starting in the early 19th century, coinciding with the removal of many tribes from their ancestral lands.
