

Spring Ceremonial Fishing

Ceremonial fishers of the Confederated Tribes were recently at the Columbia River. On hand were the William Slockish crew (right), here collecting data on their catch at Koberg, just east of Hood River. Meanwhile, Michael McConville's crew (below) pack fish for the trip to the tribal freezer. Most of the fish this year are individually packed in vacuum bags so they keep in good shape for long term storage.

Albert Kalama Sr.'s crew, Fisheries staff and Fish and Wildlife Committee members work up and pack fish for transport. Fishing conditions were tough this year. Snow melt started just before the nets went. The snow melt caused a swift current, lots of woody material and murky water in the Columbia River. Nets required frequent clearing of branches, and resetting of the net layout. By the the date of these photos, May 10, the total catch was just 154 fish short of goal of 1,000 fish.

Ty Eaglespeaker's crew, Fisheries staff and Fish and Wildlife Committee members monitor and record data, and pack fish in snow for the trip back to the tribal freezer. The crew was at Wyeth, six miles east of Cascade Locks.

Salmon Camp in June

The 2023 Salmon Camp of the Columbia River Inter-Tribal Fish Commission this summer will be hosted by the Umatilla Tribes at the Bar M Ranch, a mountain camp in the Blue Mountains.

The week-long camp this year will host 20 incoming sixth- and seventh-graders from the Warm Springs, Yakama, Umatilla and Nez Perce tribes. Salmon camp, a CRITFC project, is free to the par-

Salmon Camp student last year.

Participants. For information contact Tribal Workforce Development at the Outreach Office at 503-238-0667; or email: salmoncamp@critfc.org
