

Not much change for salmon in new Columbia River treaty

The United States and Canada have spent the past six years reworking a half-century-old deal between the two countries that outlines how the Columbia River is managed for both flood control and hydropower generation.

After 19 grueling rounds of negotiations, the two parties have announced that an agreement on the Columbia River Treaty has finally been struck.

The “agreement in principle,” released July 11, offers a rough outline of provisions of the treaty that will be updated. The final version will hold for 20 years before it can be revised.

Tribal and environmental groups have been hopeful the negotiations would offer an opportunity to inject into the treaty more safeguards for the Columbia River and its overall health.

The treaty was negotiated without any tribal input and does not reflect tribal interests, nor does it reflect needs of the river or its fish, according to the Columbia River Inter-Tribal Fish Commission.

For the last decade, CRITFC has been pushing for an ecosystem-based function management approach within the treaty that would prioritize things like increased spring and summer flows, restoring fish passages and reconnecting floodplains.

Columbia salmon threatened by hot water

Smashing records, sockeye salmon are booming up the Columbia River, in a run expected to top 700,000 fish before it’s over. But a punishing heat wave has made river temperatures so hot many may never make it their last miles home.

With water temperatures above 80 degrees in the Okanogan River, sockeye are stacking up at its mouth and waiting rather than entering the tributary to get to their spawning grounds across the U.S.-Canada border.

Called a thermal barrier, warm water is as real as a wall for a cold-water fish like sockeye. More than a quarter-million sockeye died in the Lower Columbia in 2015 just the same way: The water got too hot for them to travel.

“I think there is a good chance that happens again,
