Domestic Violence Awareness Month
holding perpetrators accountable

Every year, Domestic Violence Awareness Month sheds light on victim survivors of domestic and sexual violence.

We uplift heart wrenching stories and marvel at the resilience of Native women and girls. Having endured colonization, Native women and advocates are speaking up to reclaim justice, one piece at a time.

Four out of five Native women and girls experience violence in their lifetime, half of them experience sexual violence and in some counties they face murder rates at ten times the national average.

Despite these devastating statistics, Native women have found their voice and are asking for justice.

“These statistics demonstrate a lack of accountability,” said Lori Jump, StrongHearts Native Helpline chief executive officer.

“When court jurisdiction is shared between tribal, state and federal governments, and access to justice relies upon race, type of crime and where it occurred—perpetrators often escape prosecution.”

The National Institute of Justice painted a picture of perpetrators who victimize Native people when a study revealed that a whopping 97 percent of women identified the perpetrator as non-Native.

Similarly, 90 percent of men identified non-Natives as perpetrators.

Sadly, one third of Native women and men identified the perpetrator as being Native—35 percent of female victims and 33 percent of male victims.

These devastating statistics are in no small part due to antiquated laws and a complicated legal system with court jurisdiction hanging in the balance.

At the core of the issue is a 1978 supreme court ruling Olipphant vs Suquamish that held tribes do not have criminal jurisdiction over non-Natives.

“The ruling established a form of non-Native immunity in the judicial system and essentially denied tribal people equal access to justice,” Ms. Jump explained.

“The ruling couldn’t have been worse and for more than 35 years, Native women and girls have borne the impact of that tragic decision.”

Against the odds, Native women and their allies challenged Congress to restore some form of tribal court jurisdiction so that perpetrators could be held accountable.

It was their tenacity and testimony that inspired Congress to take action.

The Violence Against Women Act was reauthorized to include a historic provision that recognized the inherent authority of “participating tribes” to exercise “special domestic violence criminal jurisdiction” over certain defendants, regardless of their Indian or non-Indian status, who commit acts of domestic violence or dating violence or violate certain protection orders in Indian country.

“Survivors and advocates achieved what many thought impossible—to reclaim and restore a piece of Tribal sovereignty,” Lori said.

In 2022, wiouth the Violence Against Women Act Congress restored another piece of court jurisdiction when they amended a provision to recognize “Special Tribal Criminal Jurisdiction” over an expanded list of “covered crimes” with additional provisions:

Add Alaska tribes to participating in the a Special Tribal Criminal Justice Pilot Program.

The change added formal authorization for the Tribal Access Program, and re-established the U.S. Bureau of Prisons Tribal Prisoner Program.

StrongHearts Native Helpline applauds the work of survivors and advocates as their stories inspire Congress to continue its progression in the restoration of tribal sovereignty.

It is because of their perseverance that StrongHearts advocates can provide support and advocacy that honors the culture of Native American and Alaska Natives.

For confidential and anonymous support and advocacy, StrongHearts advocates are available 24/7 to provide Native-centered, trauma-informed and empowerment-based survivor advocacy based in Native American and Alaska Native culture and tradition.
