Food preservation update scheduled in McMinnville

Home gardening is popular this summer, and many families may be wondering how to safely preserve all those extra vegetables and fruits. While food preservation has long been considered a home art, in order to safely preserve food, science and research play an important role. Food that has been preserved by using old, unsafe practices can put family members at risk for serious food-borne illnesses. Using current updated methods and processing times can help ensure a safe product. A food preservation update and overview sponsored by Oregon State University Extension Service and the Family Food Education Volunteer program is scheduled for Wednesday, Sept. 9, from 10 to 11:30 a.m. in the Yamhill County Public Works Auditorium adjacent to the OSU Extension Service office, 2050 Lafayette St., in McMinnville. The class is free and advance registration is suggested. To register, call the OSU Extension Service office at 503-434-7517 or for more information contact Debra Minar Driscoll at 503-602-2651. Those interested can also register by sending an electronic message to debra.driscoll@oregonstate.edu. ■
