Lane County summit renamed after Kalapuyan chief

A mountain 35 miles southeast of Eugene has been officially renamed as Mount Halo, a name derived from Kalapuyan Chief Halito who lived in the 1800s and whose village was 20 miles west of the summit.

The 4,200-foot peak was previously called Swastika Mountain, a name that became controversial because of its association with Nazism and Hitler’s Third Reich.

Tribal member David Lewis, who is an assistant professor of anthropology and ethnic and Indigenous studies at Oregon State University, said renaming the peak was necessary because of its association with World War II and fascism.

“We need to at times revisit names that have been given to the land, and to rivers, and towns, and maybe replace those with things that have more resonance with today’s society,” Lewis said.

The U.S. Board of Geographic Names approved the name change on April 13 and it took effect immediately.

Swastika Mountain’s namesake predated World War II and was reportedly named for a local ranch in Lane County that branded cattle with the symbol. ■
