THREE MEN DROWNED.

Fatal Egg Gathering Expedition at Port Orford.

News was received here, the later part of last week, that the gasoline launch, belonging to the Strahan Brothers of Gold Beach, had been found drifting outside, near the Port Orford reef, and that the Strahan boys and Theodore Fleming, a quarter blood Indian who had gone out with them were supposed to have drowned.

The particulars of the incident, so far as known, appear to be as follows: Charles and William Strahan and Theodore Fleming, of Gold Beach had gone out on Wednesday from Port Orford to gather eggs from the rocks in the vicinity of Port Orford, and the ocean being too rough, that day the boys returned, and on Thursday went out again for the same purpose.

On Friday the launch was observed adrift, and on investigation it was learned that the guns which the parties had taken along, and their coats were in the launch but nothing could be learned of the men. Search was instituted and the tug from Rogue River was sent to the scene. On her way up the small boat which the Strahan boys had taken with them to land on the rocks from, was discovered off Frankfort bottom side up, this being the only trace to indicate what had happened to the party.

Search was continued until all the rocks had been visited and there was no longer hope that any of the party had escaped, but nothing was discovered that would in any manner show what had happened.

It is supposed that the party anchored the launch and started to visit the rocks in the smaller boat for the purpose of gathering eggs, which was their purpose in going out to them, and in pursuing this purpose the incident happened, then left no one to tell the story.

We are informed that one of the small pieces where the sea broke, was very difficult to land on and that the party had been warned against trying to land on that rock, as it was said that the ocean was too turbulent on that occasion.

The Strahan boys were about 28 to 32 years old, Charles being the elder. Charles was married and leaves a wife and two children. The mother of the Strahan boys resides in San Francisco, and Mrs. John D. Cooley, and Mrs. Frank Bailey, both of Curry county are sisters. Will Strahan, and young Fleming, who was about 20 years old, were unmarried.

Port Orford Tribune: The theory advanced, and to admit the correct one, is that on reaching the reef the boys abandoned their launch, and entering their small boat, attempted to land on one of the rocks for the purpose of gathering eggs to be disposed of on reaching their destination. There was a heavy swell, and it is possible that the boat was blown on to a rock, and fell back when the swell left her, causing the occupants and rendering them helpless. The Strahan boys were excellent swimmers, and under ordinary circumstances would have reached a rock, even though the sea was running high. Each possessed great strength and endurance, and were experienced surfmen.

From The Coos Bay News.

Before going to press we learn that W. W. Gage and others are after a man on South Coos river, who it is thought may be Lewis. The party, however he is, is doing all he can to evade his pursuers.

H. R. Reed puts a crew of men to work yesterday morning, grading at the Bay City shipyard, to make room for the building of a lumbered tug-boat. W. H. Noble is getting out the keel, and we understand that work will be commenced on construction as soon as possible. She is to be built for James Heyman & Co., of San Francisco, and her dimensions are as follows: Length over all, 255 feet; beam, 32 feet; depth, 16 feet; to carry 1,500,000 feet of lumber on a draft of 18 feet.
