POLLY LARKIN

A man who has passed the sixty mark and still has health and energy of youth, a man who is learning something new and using up his old learning, a man who has been in the thick of things all the while, is not afraid of anything. He is not afraid of work, he is not afraid of change, he is not afraid of anything that is not entirely beyond his ability to understand and to work up.

The experience of this world is his training and his work. He is not afraid of anything that is not entirely beyond his ability to understand and to work up.

There is no limit to what he can do. There is no limit to what he can learn. There is no limit to what he can teach. There is no limit to what he can give. There is no limit to what he can be.

He is not afraid of work. He is not afraid of change. He is not afraid of anything that is not entirely beyond his ability to understand and to work up.

He is not afraid of anything that is not entirely beyond his ability to understand and to work up.
