There is one young man of Bandon who is deeply regretting his kindness of heart. He was asked as a favor to ride a horse to Bullards so the beast might be loaded onto the Dispatch. Before he had time to consider, the boat had departed and nothing must do but he should look up his steed. He found a rawboned plug, out of common courtesy called a horse, and after proceeding part way found that he was not built for a bareback performer. After much persuasion with a two inch pole, the fiery steed brought him to his destination, where he joyfully descended to terra firma once more vowing never more to do stunts on horse back. Since then the young man has been eating his meals off the mantle and had to lay off from his work at the ship yard.

That Abe Ruef, the San Francisco grafter, was not the debonair, smiling, happy-go-lucky fellow that he was pictured by the San Francisco papers when recaptured at Trocadero after his picturesque escape from custody was the statement made by a deputy of W. J. Burns, who found Ruef, to Horace Stevens. Mr. Stevens who is assistant to T. B. Neuhausen, special agent of the interior department, has just returned from San Francisco where he has been engaged in government work. Continuing he said: "Ruef was not only not happy and smiling when retaken by Burns, the deputy told me, when he discovered who came after him, almost fainted and had to be assisted into Burns' automobile."
