

ON AN AUTUMN SKETCH.

Thanks to the artist, ever on my wall
The sunset stays; that hill in glory rolled,
The trees and clouds in crimson and in gold,
Burn on, nor cool when evening shadows fall.

There is a season that's brimful of gladness and joy,
When the heartstrings of life gladly ring;
'Tis the bright golden Autumn unknown to alloy,
When the little brown squirrel is king.

When the bushy-tailed fellow is lord over all,
The woods are decked gaily to greet him, While scarlet tinged leaves from the maple trees fall,
And dance o'er the meadows to meet
him.

Through woodlands he scurries, through runlets he hurries,
To the hickory tree in the wold;
And as happy is he as a king ere could be,
Though he wears not a circlet of gold.

Heigho to the monarch of dingle and hollow!
His praises let everyone sing;
For we must needs be merry, be happy and chery,
When the little brown squirrel is king.

Advertising to John

John Willoway gazed from the design on the Bristol board in his hand to the flushed face of his fair visitor.
"Excellent, Miss Dobb," he said. "A sure seller. You are a positive genius in advertisement designing. Now I have sent for you with the object of entering into a permanent arrangement with regard to your services. I find there are not enough working hours in my day, and I wish to relegate the advertisement department to a capable specialist. Salary $250. What do you say?"

The young lady laughed delightedly.
"You really mean that you will pay me $250 a year for supplying this sort of thing to order?" she said.
"Don't disparage it," he smiled. "I have certain proof of its effectiveness, and I'm a business man. Publicity is the lifeblood of our enterprise, and I want good stuff. Say you'll accept."

"I'm glad you think so highly of my efforts," the girl returned. "I never imagined when I posted you that first essay that it would lead to this. It struck me as I read your advertisements in the magazines that I could possibly produce something worthy, and, having time on my hands and knowing 'Zalvo' to be everything you claimed for it, I made the attempt.
You were good enough to accept it and to write more. Your check made me feel quite proud of myself, and I willingly complied. As to any permanent arrangement, however, you must not think me ungrateful, but circumstances would not permit of my joining your staff. If you will favorably consider my efforts as a free lance I will undertake to continue the supply for my own gratification. I feel quite somewhat, I can assure you, when I see my ads in the papers. You must understand that this work is done surreptitiously. My people don't suspect me of a hobby, and I'm afraid they wouldn't be altogether pleased to know my particular form of madness."

"You underestimate your capabilities, believe me," said John. "I may take it then that a permanency is out of the question. Frankly I'm disappointed, but I will bid you to your undertaking, and I shall expect you to bring me fresh designs whenever the afflatus drives you."

She rose and held out her hand.
"Thank you," she said, returning his smile. "I will certainly come."
For some time after she had gone John Willoway sat before his desk in a pleasant reverie, conjured up by her charm of manner and appearance.

The secret of the composition of 'Zalvo' had been given to him but four years previously, when he was earning a modest livelihood as a journalist, and, realizing his possibilities, he had launched the business. From small beginnings he had, by sheer work and the application of the greater percentage of his profits to publicity, developed the enterprise until 'Zalvo' had become a household word throughout the kingdom.

At thirty-two he was well on the high road to fortune.
The claims of business in those four years had held him chained; and, though in bearing and appearance, he was a man who might have wooed successfully, he had not sought the society of the fair sex, and was, consequently, wittily heart-whole.

"I guessed it was hopeless from the first sight of her," he mused, as he gazed at the design. "Her whole appearance proclaims refinement, taste and wealth. This kind of a thing is but a passing whim—a stolen pleasure to be snatched furtively for fear of disapproving parents who, doubtless, would regard dabbling in trade as a blot on their escutcheon. Quaint that I should pluck on 'Zalvo.' But, by George! she can produce the real stuff.
I wish she had to earn her daily bread."

pen and switched his thoughts from the prosaic to the ideal. The seed of romance which had hitherto blown past him, had at length struck soil, and his pleasant musing was evidence that it was exceedingly likely to germinate.
As he banged down his roll-top desk that night he hoped that she would soon repeat her visit.

The desire to see her again grew stronger as the days passed. In the hours when business did not claim his thoughts her picture was a recurring memory. On the seventh day after her coming, hoping to hasten her call, he ventured to write a brief request for the promised few designs.

When her card was brought to him the following morning some new strange sense of gladness seemed to permeate him, and he met her with hand outstretched and smiling face.
That second visit proved the precursor of many, with intervals which gradually lessened, until the day dawned on him when the hope that he might not ask in vain filled him with joy.

That morning, for the first time, she had thrown aside her incognito and, as he learned her father's name, despite the fact that he was a Baronet, a feeling of distinct confidence was instilled within him. She had looked for some expression of surprise, instead of which he laughed, as a man laughs who is sure of ultimate victory.

"Your father looks down on trade, I suppose," he said, becoming suddenly serious. "He would be angry if he knew that his daughter had soiled her hands with business."

"Father is broad-minded," she returned. "He hasn't always been a Baronet, you know. But mother's proudest boast is her pedigree. I'm afraid her feelings would be terribly outraged."

"She wouldn't recognize the 'Zalvo' man, eh?" he said. "Freeze his presumption with an icy glare through her lozengette, eh?"

She smiled at the picture.
"That reminds me," she said. "The fount of inspiration will dry up for three weeks. We're off to Brighton tomorrow."

"That reminds me," he laughed. "I'm feeling the want of a holiday myself.
Would you recommend Dr. Brighton in my case?"

"I think the treatment might benefit you," she returned, archly.
"Which hotel would you suggest?"
he asked.

"I should say the Metropole would suit you admirably," she replied.

Sir Thomas Carham was having a warm ten minutes. His lady was evidently highly incensed.

"The thing's apparent," she was saying. "The man is always with her.
Everybody in the hotel is talking about it. It must be stopped at once, and it is for you to settle his pretensions."

"Very decent chap, my dear," he ventured, mildly. "I must admit that I rather like him."

"Your liking or disliking has nothing to do with it," snapped the lady.
"You know very well I have other views for Kitty. Sapphead dotes upon her, and I will not have the match spotted. The way she gallivants about with this 'Zalvo' fellow is absolutely disgusting."

"Why don't you speak to her?" he observed dryly.

"What an insane question!" she returned. "The very way to make her think more of him. It is for you to speak to him, and in unmistakable language. Zalvo indeed!"

"Very good stuff, my dear," he said.
"I've known it cure some obstinate cases, and, besides, it must be a mint to him."

"Don't be asinine!" retorted the lady, her generous form quivering with anger. "You will please understand I expect to send him to the rightabout this very night."

"Very well, my dear, very well," he returned, as he pulled on his dress coat.
"I'll talk to him after dinner. Ah, there they come across the promenade. Handsome chap he looks, too. I like his face.
Got the right stamp. All right, my dear, don't excite yourself. Go and dress; I'll talk to him."

The girl went by the bedroom door to her own room humming a snatch of song.

Sir Thomas caught it, and stood stock-still, gazing with apparent abstraction through the window.

"Sounds distinctly unpromising," he said to himself. "If I still possess the faculty of putting two and two together I'm afraid I'm in for a hard case. And, when I think of that bright specimen of nobility, Sapphead, I'm blessed if I feel inclined to enthuse over the job.
This other is a man. I wish to goodness Maria would tackle him herself."

The dinner through the insane remarks of the irragressible Sapphead, who dined with them, bored him exceedingly. The smiles with which his wife rewarded his feeble witticisms encouraged him to shine, and he was well content. Politeness compelled Kitty and himself to interpolate a word now and then, but he fancied, as he noted her wayward glances towards a certain table, that she wished herself elsewhere.

Before she passed to the drawing-room he contrived to have a word with her.
"Kit," he whispered, "I've got orders to send Mr. Zalvo to the rightabout."

She looked at him and smiled complacently.
"I believe he wishes to speak to you," she said. "See; he's coming now. Be gentle with him."

"Good evening, Sir Thomas," John greeted him. "Are you for a smoke?
If so, I should like to join you."

"Very pleased," said the baronet, and, together, they made for the smoke-room.

Ensclosed in a retired corner of the cosy divan they puffed contemplatively at their cigars for a spell in silence.
Both had something vital to say, and both were equally at a loss how best to commence.

"This 'Zalvo' of yours is a good thing, eh?" observed Sir Thomas, temperately.

"Excellent, both for humanity and peculiarly for me," returned John.
"Ah; costs about twopence and, with the stamp, sells for 1s. 1/2d. Ingredients simple, but efficacious. The rest is advertising," rejoined Sir Thomas. "It strikes me as a very in-cursive thing when once the name is known."

"You summarize the position fairly correctly," said John. "Ingredients simple, but remedy undoubtedly efficacious.
Advertising may sell a bad thing once, but it's only the good ones which tell all the time."

"I remember my mother possessed an old recipe for a salve which was wonderful in its effect," went on Sir John.
"She used to dispense gillpot right and left, and was never so pleased as when she heard of an obstinate case being cured by it, but she guarded the secret of its composition most zealously. A dear old lady, my boy, though well over 70, still healthy and happy."

"To such a dear old lady, the best friend I ever knew, I owe the secret of 'Zalvo,'" said John, quietly.

The baronet eyed him thoughtfully.
There was that in his face that promised a revelation.

"Tell me about it," he said, presently.
"I was a journalist at the time," said John. "Chance gave us acquaintance, and she was good enough to take an interest in me. I think some of the pleasantest hours of my life have been spent in her society. Having personally proved the efficacy of her recipe, I ventured to urge upon her that it was selfish to keep it from the community, and, eventually, persuaded her to give me the secret. The rest you know.
From the very first sale she has been the recipient of a royalty of one penny per pot, which, I believe, she religiously disburses in various charities, having a sufficient income to keep her in comfort. It was only on this condition that she would accept anything."

The suspicion which had been incited in the mind of the baronet was now almost certain.

"Where did you say the lady lived?"
he queried.

"I did not mention the town," said John, smiling. "It was Leamington."
"Ah!" ejaculated Sir Thomas, and was silent.

Presently he knocked the ash from his cigar, and leaning forward, said abruptly:

"Willoway, why aren't you a Lord, a Baronet, or at least a Knight?"

"I take it that I may, travel that road," John responded gravely.

"I like you, hang it, but I do!" exclaimed Sir Thomas impulsively.

"That's good news," said John. "It encourages me to state the request which I brought you here to urge."

"What was the dear old lady's name?" queried Sir Thomas.

"Mrs. Carham," returned John.
"My mother!"

"So I believe," said John nonchalantly. "I want her to be my grandmother-in-law."

"What does Kit say?"

"I have good reason to believe she would advocate the legal relationship," said John, calmly.

"Let's go and talk to her mother," said Sir Thomas, rising and taking his arm.—Philadelphia Telegraph.

The Great Stone Face.
Colonel James P. Robertson, of the English army, declares in "Personal Adventures" that the history of his face alone would fill a chapter. When quite a small boy he had the present of a toy cannon. He found the cannon nearly full of paper, and to get that out he took a bit of strong wire, made it red-hot, and tried to burn the paper out. Bang! went the cannon, and the wire shot through the lobe of his left ear.

When I was trying to blow up a wasp's nest, he continues, the mine of coarse blasting powder went off in my face, and peppered it full of unexpected large grains of powder.

I went to my room, and with a gold pin dug out every grain, and cleaned the wound with my nail-brush. It was a most painful operation, but if I had left the powder in I should have had a blue face for life.

A fall which occurred when I was out hunting smashed the bone of my nose into little bits, and on another occasion I fell on a rock, and my two front teeth came through the skin below the under lip.

My mother used to say, "O liddle, liddle, you'll come to some awful death if you don't take more care of yourself!" But at the age of 84 I am able to take a twenty-mile run, on my "bike," and am without mark or damage on my face.

Science and Invention

The Nile is noted for the variety of its fish. An expedition sent by the British museum brought home 9,000 specimens.

The hands of female mummies found in the tombs of Egypt are literally covered with rings, in many instances there being from two to six on every finger.

The Arctic circle in Scandinavia, enjoys the reputation at the present time of being the northernmost line of rails, but this is soon to be eclipsed by the construction of a line to Spitzbergen, 10 degrees farther north. The principal object of the new line is to reach the coal deposits which have been recently discovered in this vicinity.

The American Ethnological Society announces that it is about to begin a series of publications of authentic material collected among native American tribes. It is pointed out that hitherto little has been collected in their own language concerning the customs, beliefs and ideas of the natives. Yet authentic records of information given by the Indians are regarded as of prime importance for a thorough study of the ethnology and early history of the American continent. The Indians are believed to possess much valuable knowledge not yet recorded.

The difficulty now found in bonding together new and old concrete has been obviated by a recent patent. This bond consists of an extract of coal tar, used instead of water, as the mixing agent for neat Portland cement. The mixture is laid in one-eighth inch to one-quarter inch layers on the old concrete surface, and immediately followed by new concrete or mortar. The inventor claims the compound to be entirely insoluble, and to form a complete and monolithic bond between the old and new works. It is furnished to customers free, they paying the freight and cost of barrels, the cost being covered by a certain royalty per square foot paid to the patentee of the process.

Reports gathered by the Japanese since the war with Russia indicate that northern Manchuria possesses large stores of valuable minerals, such as gold, silver, copper, lead and iron.
Under the operation partly of Chinese officials and partly of native companies and small capitalists the average annual output has been about $10,000,000.
But a large part of the deposits have not even been touched. Gold is found both in quartz and in placers.
The country drained by the Huifaho River is reported to be rich in gold, silver, copper, lead and coal. The mineral regions are accessible by means of the Yalu, the Huifaho, the Sungari, the Liao and other rivers and their tributaries.

As everybody knows, the famous comet of Hatley, the brightest of all comets known to pay periodical visits to the neighborhood of the sun, is expected to reappear in the sky within a few years. Astronomers all over the world are now interested in the problem of predicting the precise time of its perihelion passage, or nearest approach to the sun. Several predictions have already been published. The latest is that made by Messrs. Cromme-lin and Cowell before the Royal Astronomical Society in January. Calculating the probable effects of the interference of the various planets with the comet's progress in its orbit, they think that the date of the next perihelion will fall before the middle of May, 1910. The last previous perihelion passage of the comet was in November, 1835.

They Love the Empress.
It is doubtful if any royal consort is more loved by her people than is the empress of Japan. Educated according to feudal ideas and skilled in all the accomplishments befitting one of her social eminence, her majesty strongly favors the broadness of the new education for woman, and from her private purse gives large sums toward the maintenance of women's schools and universities. During the war with Russia, the empress visited the hospitals many times and every day passed hours making bandages. The effect of these bandages upon the wounded soldiers has been of deep interest to medical and scientific men, for the soldiers honored by them seemed to rally under a peculiar mental influence. All other bandages were destroyed after their first use; those made by the empress were sterilized and used again for the simple reason of their effect on the recovery of the soldiers.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Her Mourning.
Maud—Why is that lady over the way in black? Is she mourning for any one?
Bess—Yes; a husband.
Maud—I didn't know she'd been married.
Bess—No, but she's mourning for a husband all the same.

Of Course.
Professor (a little distracted)—I'm glad to see you. How's your wife?
"I regret it, professor, but I'm not married."
"Ah, yes. Then of course your wife's still single."—Ellegende Blatter.

The only time a boy has any use for a peace conference is when he realizes it is up to him to cry "Enough."

RENOWNED JAPANESE SOLDIER.

General Baron Nogi, who was thrown from his horse at Tokio and seriously injured, won undying fame through his capture of Port Arthur from the Russians. He is a Samurai, and is 57 years of age. He first achieved military renown in the war with China in 1894, when he also figured in the capture of Port Arthur from the Chinese, the men under his command storming successfully the famous Itzehan fort.
After he had wrested Port Arthur from General Stoessel, in the last war, he marched north with his troops, and materially assisted in the capture of Mukden, and the utter defeat of Kouropatkin. Baron Nogi is noted as a strategist and organizer, and has served as Governor of Formosa. Before taking

GENERAL NOGI.

command at Port Arthur he participated in the brilliant Japanese victories at Kinchow and Naushan Hill. After the war opened he is alleged to have expressed the hope that none of his three sons would survive; and, strange to say, all fell victims to Russian bullets.

AN INDIAN MOSES.

Creek Chief Would Lead His Followers to Settle Mexico.
Chitto Harjo, better known as Crazy Snake, a full-blooded Creek Indian, is planning to become the Moses of his people. All his life he has been fighting the government in a vain endeavor to prevent the absorption of his homeland and the lands of his people by the whites and now old and broken in spirit he sees the uselessness of the struggle and would flee from the long-dreaded inevitable. For five years he has been the leader of the more discontented and resentful Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes. Now he is trying to dispose of all the land in the Creek nation that is held by his followers and lead them to Mexico to colonize there.
There he believes they can lead a natural primitive life undisturbed by the white man. Crazy Snake is 70 years old, so that the task before him, even if neither the United States nor Mexico interposed objection, would be an arduous one.

CRAZY SNAKE.

Pardon for an Old Crime.
France has just pardoned a criminal who enjoyed a moment of notoriety thirty-nine years ago, but who has since been practically forgotten. He is Berz-owsky, who in 1871 fired a pistol at the Czar, Alexander II, as he was reviewing the French troops in the Bois de Boulogne.

The shot missed the Emperor. It struck a woman among the spectators, but she was only slightly wounded. The would-be assassin was a Polish workingman. He was sentenced to deportation and life imprisonment and was shipped to New Caledonia in short order. He was really insane. The fact was recognized by the jailers. He has grown worse as the years passed. His delusions took the form of inventions, one of which was a perpetual motion machine, and he used to try to bargain with the governor of the penal colony for freedom in exchange for the secret.
For some years he has enjoyed relative freedom on the island. On reaching his 70th year he was allowed to live in a little cottage outside the prison and to dispose of his own time. The government still provided for his support and he amused himself cultivating mechanical projects. Lately his case was taken up by the Humanitarian League and his complete pardon was the result. The Parisian papers speak of it as a doubtful mercy. It is hard to see what shelter he can find in France now except in an insane asylum.

Good Show Except—
The show was all right, except there were too many guns, too many indifferent actors, too many climaxes, too many weak lines and too many bewhiskered jokes; otherwise the show was good. The best part was played by the scenery, which said nothing, and the worst by the actor, who said the most. The gallery was topheavy and the parquet fair.—Emporia Gazette.

The Hideous Dress Coat.
Conscience, which makes cowards of us all, is being abolished, but the dress coat, which makes waiters of us all, persists.—Puck.

A man never fully realizes how home he really is until he has his picture taken in a group.

RAM'S HORN BLASTS.

Warning Notes Calling the Wicked to Repentance.

The good we ought to do will never be done unless we do it.
The devil may sometimes get a new hook and line, but he keeps on fishing with the same old bait.
The man who prays to be nothing, generally is.

Whenever you made a mistake, make it teach you something.
It has been the dreamers who have kept the world in motion.

Until fire touches gunpowder, it is as well behaved as sweet milk.
The man who would be considered wise often turns out to be otherwise.

The lower we go down to help men, the higher stand we are taking for Christ.

It is better to have little talent and noble purpose, than much talent and no purpose.
The Lord can work with dull tools, but he doesn't like to do it any better than we do.

The golden opportunity comes in on the slow freight, and goes out on the lightning express.
Balaam's ass was an L. L. D., compared to the man who knocks his brains out with a jug.

In the same breath in which Jesus said, "Let not your heart be troubled," he also said, "believe."
It is a hard to find a man who will stand up like a man and take the blame for his own wrong doing.

BACKWOODS DENTISTRY.

To be in the woods, miles from civilization, with an aching tooth is an experience which befell Antoine, a guide, who camped with Fred Mather, the author of "Men I Have Fished With." When he had borne the pain as long as he could, he insisted that Mr.
Mather pull the aching tooth.

"You gut pull dis tooth," announced Antoine.

"Antoine, I haven't got a tool to pull a tooth with. I can't do it; it's no use talking."

"Now looka here. See how I fix dis bullet-mol' for pull a tooth." He showed how he had ruined a good bullet-mold to make a poor pair of forceps.

I looked the thing over with conflicting emotions. Here was an instrument of torture which in expert hands might relieve suffering, but in mine seemed sure to increase it. One thing was certain—Antoine was in earnest.

The offending tooth was a premolar on the right side of the lower jaw.
Antoine laid himself on the floor, and I sat with my back to the logs of the cabin. If they did not give way, I was all right. I pulled him up to me, put a wooden plug between his molars, to keep his mouth open, planted both feet on his shoulders, and pulled.

There was a howl as I pulled with arms and pushed with legs, but the "pufficans" slipped from my hands.
They were all right as far as a grip on the tooth went, but they were not made for a strong pull on their handles.

Antoine rose and looked at me, "more in sorrow than in anger," and I hastened to say, "The mold slipped in my hand. There is no grip on the handles, but if you can stand another go of this,
I will fix the thing so that I will bring out the tooth or your jaw-bone. What do you say?"

Antoine merely nodded assent, and I put the handles of the bullet-mold into the fire and then turned them outward so they could not slip through my hands. When the handles were cool and all was ready, I looked at Antoine.
He rose and said, "Come on; I be all a-ready." And he lay on the floor in the proper place.

Carefully pushing the "pufficans" down as far as I could get them, I gripped the handles, straightened my legs, and with a snap the tooth came out, and my head made a tunk on the log behind that seemed hard enough to have left a dent in either head or log.

Antoine jumped up, and yelled with joy. He took the tooth and threw it in the fire, and after a comforting rest we went to bed.

One Day Late.
Ernest had been to a children's party and eaten all that he could possibly put beneath his little blouse, but it nearly broke his heart to think he could not do greater justice to the feast of good things before him. A bright idea came to him. Early next morning he went around to the scene of the festivities, and on being asked by Mrs. Johnson what he would like, replied, "I'd like all the things I couldn't eat yesterday, please."—Harper's Weekly.

So Was the Tip.
"Look here, waiter, I want a steak," said the passenger on the dining car.
"No steaks, sah."
"Bring me a couple of chops, then."
"No chops either, sah."
"Well, I declare I thought this was a limited train?"
"It be, sah; everything's limited, sah!"
But I've only had one egg to eat!"
"Yes, sah; de eggs is limited, sah," said the waiter.—Yonkers Statesman.

An engaged couple look at each other's faults with their eyes closed; after marriage they see a magnifying glass.