

Our Part in the Orient

Of the $2,150,000,000 of importations by the commercial orient the United States exports but 5 per cent. We are practically out of the running in that trade, as appears from reports by the bureau of statistics, which appear in the World's Work magazine. The importing countries comprise India, China, Japan, Turkey, Egypt, the Dutch East Indies, and the Philippines, and contain more than half the population of the world. They form the great market place for the goods of the manufacturing nations of the west.

The insignificant part we play in this colossal trade is due to the strenuous rivalry of England and Germany, and lately of Japan for the business. England supports a population of 42,000,000 on 121,491 square miles of territory, or an area but one and one fourth times as large as that of the state of Oregon. Their very existence depends on the sale of their manufactured products abroad, and the English contest for the oriental markets with the energy of desperation. They must sell, or their people fall into unemployment and want.

In Germany it is the national policy to keep the people at home and to support them by manufacture of goods for other people to buy. The Germans have entered the list, with England contesting for the heavy buying orientals, and the rich returns they receive from the importing orient are the means by which they support 60,000,000 of people on 208,830 square miles of territory, or a little more than twice the area of Oregon. Like England, Japan has more population than her territory will support, and the consequences of her awakening is that she has become a powerful competitor in the sale of manufactured goods to oriental buyers. It is a struggle for survival.

No such necessities have yet appeared in the United States, and the struggle for markets here is less keen. There has been and still is free land for the surplus population. The country has a population of only 85,000,000 and a territorial expanse of 3,567,563 square miles. It is as large as 17 Germanies and nearly 30 times as large as England. Its time to dispute more keenly for the oriental markets will come with a congested population, lower wages and a reduced standard of living.—Journal.

CHAMBERLAIN'S COUGH REMEDY THE BEST ON THE MARKET

"I have used Chamberlain's Cough Remedy and find it to be the best on the market," says E. W. Tardy, editor of The Sentinel, Gainsboro, Tenn. "Our baby had several colds the past winter and Chamberlain's Cough Remedy always gave it relief at once and cured it in a short time. I always recommend it when opportunity presents itself." For sale by C. Y. Lowe.

Extracts From Rev. Haberly's Memorial Sermon

"Remember the former things." Isa. 46.9

"Bless the Lord, O my soul; and forget not his benefits." Ps. 103:2 Both texts quoted have reference to the blessings Divine Providence had bestowed in times past. The former has a national reference in that it calls upon Israel, then doubting God, and backsliding from his way, to remember God's gracious dealings with Israel as a people, and urges them not to trust to the help and arms of surrounding heathen nations, but to trust again, as they formerly did, in the Lord Jehovah, and the prophet then calls to their mind the many gracious blessings the Lord bestowed upon them in return for their confidence and faith in him.

The second text has a personal reference—where the speaker or writer encourages himself to greater faith, by remembering the Lord's past gracious dealing with his soul.

Now these verses perhaps do not directly bear upon the past life and sacrifices of those whose memory we today wish to revere, yet indirectly we must ever discern the hand of Providence grinding and elevating rolling all issues and all history; and so by remembering the deeds of our departed heroes, we in a measure recall the providence of Jehovah among us as people and individuals.

It is well that this day be kept as a memorial of our beloved dead. Devoted as it is to the particular honor of our soldiers dead, we would nevertheless by no means forget our other loved ones gone today. But we cannot do a better thing than to honor the memory of our country's protectors and defenders of the flag.

The purpose of the day is to inspire love of country or true patriotism. So that the real sentiment of every American citizen should be what Shakespeare expressed most fitly in the following sentence: "I love my country's good—with a respect more tender—more holy and profound than mine own life."

Those who fell in battle, or have gone on before, since the war closed, still live in our hearts, and "to live in hearts we leave behind us is not to die." (Campbell) We remember today and always, how much they ventured, how they left behind their loved ones—risked the loss of all their property, said farewell to all their friends, and cheerfully hazarded their lives, and thousands upon thousands of instances lost them for the sake of great ideas and great principles. For these they willingly denied themselves the comforts and blessings of home, and endured the hardships of camp and field, and the dangers of the battlefield and the horrors of war prisons, and the exposures to dread disease, and faced death itself, unflinching and even cheerfully. By thus honoring them, we not only show our gratitude to them for their great service, but we show that we too love the nation whose honor they followed, and that we too wish to do something that will prove us worthy of our high heritage as American citizens.

But the patriot dead did not all wear the blue for march under the stars and stripes. There were patriots at home who upheld the soldier's heart and inspired him to do his duty. There were the women who gave up their loved ones—who breathed prayers for their safety and victory—who sewed diligently for them—whose hands wrought for them, whose letters encouraged them—whose undying love for them, forever embodied in itself something that should comfort and relieve them in the stress of battle and the loneliness of camp. Their memories—the memory of these sainted women patriots we would honor today with the memory of the soldiers departed.

And shall we not also forget past differences, and the hatred that war engenders, and also remember with respect and admiration those who wore the gray and their loved ones? They fought for what they considered a sacred principle—the principle of liberty—if they were mistaken and I think they were—as to the particular questions involved at the time—yet to strive to uphold principle is a noble thing. It is hard enough to wage a war crowned with victory; but to lose the best young blood of the land, to see ones property destroyed, to see their homes devastated and broken up, to have ones former habits of life and customs suddenly changed—add to this the disappointment and terrible burden of expense of the war—together with the chagrin of failure and defeat—and you have a faint picture of what the defeated people of our beautiful southland had to endure. No wonder the great and tender heart of Lincoln went out with great sympathy to the people who were so sorely stricken—most unwillingly by his instrumentality—because Providence had placed him in a position which made it incumbent upon him to carry on the great war to a successful issue for the union. But even during the continuance of the struggle Lincoln saw through and beyond the end of the war and beheld his vision and also his purpose (had he lived) and for the future. In his Gettysburg speech he said: "This nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom and government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth." That was his sublime vision. Here he enunciates a great principle; and as he spoke in one of his inaugural addresses "with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right." He enunciates his purpose. It is evident, that national awakening or regeneration in the principle of a larger liberty, would have marked the completion of his second term, had not the assassin's bullet cut off his life, just at the beginning of the second term and just at the close of the war.

What he saw and purposed, only Lincoln could tell us, for he saw far deeper and farther into the future than many or all others around him. But the general position which he assumed is patent, and with Lincoln's motto as our model, we may today profit by considering one or two great principles that need our most hearty and loyal support "with firmness" to do what God gives us to see is the right."

But the peace of the world depends upon the citizenship of the nations. If peace is to prevail the citizens of the nations must support and uphold just laws, and proper enforcement of the laws. I am sure that in proclaiming this message of peace to you, soldiers of America, I have no more approving auditors than yourselves, who fought in the army to bring about peace. I think that you agree with General Sherman that war under any circumstances "is hell"

Then there is that stupendous course the drink traffic and all its attendant evils, stalking up and down the land. Temperance sentiment and temperance habits are making rapid progress throughout the land. But intemperance is still slaying its thousands, breaking up homes, tearing the clothes off children, and broken hearted wives, and the liquor power is still all too powerful in politics.

We must continue to resist this evil as our patriot forefathers resisted the encroachment of England upon the colonies, and as Webster, Garrison, Phillips, Beecher and others resisted the evils of slavery, and as Christ resisted the assumption of religious authority, by those who though perfect in outward life, were utterly unworthy and unfit by reason of their pride and self suffering, even to enter the Kingdom of God.

The true patriot is not only an opposer of evil, he is a staunch supporter of the good. He may be a loyal partisan but he will not submit to the control of corrupt party bosses. He will support the man who is honest in private and political life. He will encourage the honest business man; he will render adequate service for the compensation given him; he will be faithful in his home, and domestic life, and he will praise the faithful husband and wife rather than gossip about the other kind; he will uphold the sacredness of marriage and the family ties; he will honor the mother as God honors her in his word most blessed of woman-kind.

He will respect law and the government; because, while bad men may sometimes secure control of the offices and enact bad laws, yet God says, "be subject to the powers that be." He will be modest in dress and social habits. He will live in a plane that is not mimical to his and others physical mental and moral well-being.

But above all he will tear God and keep his commandments. It was the great Gladstone who said that in his sixty years of contact with great men in the Cabinet of England and he had met many that all but five were christians. He said in this same connection: "Talk about questions of the day, or questions of state. There is but one question, the gospel. It can and will correct everything needing correction."

Soldiers of America and all friends present, I would be recreant to my duty today did I not emphasize above everything else our religious obligations today. You fought for two great principles: Liberty for the slave and for the union. There is another liberty, the freedom that God gives us; that I wish to speak of. A minister's duty is to make men seek and know God's precepts and statutes and to do them that they may walk at liberty. We ministers are for you. It is our business to seek your moral and spiritual good; your full and complete emancipation from the bondage that keeps our moral natures and our whole being in chains to the evil power, who rejoices in our misery and ultimate ruin. We try to enlighten you with the truth as God has given us to see the truth.
