Famous Sayings.

By Albert Payson Terhune.
(Copyright 1910; Press Publishing Co.)
"I shall conquer Rome!" boasted Pyrrhus, King of Epirus. "That will make me master of Italy."
"And then?" queried Cineas, his wise counsellor.
"And then, country by country, I shall conquer all the world."
"And then?" insisted Cineas.

"And then I shall lead a life of ease and comfort."
"Why not take your ease and comfort now?" suggested Cineas. "and avoid all that danger and bloodshed?"
The advice was good. But it was thrown away on this ambitious Greek king who had resolved to become a world conqueror like Alexander the Great. Pyrrhus made great mistakes. Instead of marching eastward like Alexander, and attacking the weaker Persians and Hincus, he turned westward and pitted his strength against that of Rome.

He crossed to Italy in 280 B. C. with an army of 25,000, and landed near Tarentum. He thought all Southern Italy would join him against Rome. He was mistaken. Only a small body of Italians flocked to his standard. With these and his Greeks he made his way north, only to find the armies of Rome marshaled ready to oppose his progress.

On the banks of the river Siris the two forces met in battle. It was Rome's first great conflict with a foreign enemy. The Greeks were heavily armored and carried long spears. The Romans wore heavy armor and had short, thick swords. For a long time the battle raged. The Roman swords could not charge a path through the array of spears. Nor could the Greeks pierce the Roman armor.

Pyrrhus, knowing he would be the mark for every hostile soldier, put his golden helmet and scarlet cloak on Megacles, one of his officers. Megacles was almost at once killed. Lavinus, the Roman General, ordered the royal helmet and cloak displayed to the troops. Pyrrhus, to prove he was still alive, dashed bareheaded along the front of the Greek line, escaping by miracle from the rash exploit.

At length as the infantry of each army could make no headway against that of the other, the Roman general ordered a cavalry charge, hoping by riding down the spearsmen to open a way for the heavy-armed Roman swordsmen. How this maneuver would have succeeded will never be known. For just as the Roman cavalry charged the Greek ranks opened and out rushed a throng of enormous and horrible monsters.

The Roman horses, at sight of these creatures, ran terror-stricken in every direction. The Roman soldiery, who feared no mortal foe, fled in abject panic, thinking they were pursued by gigantic devils.

As a matter of fact, the "monsters" were a herd of elephants that Pyrrhus had brought with him from Epirus. The Romans had never seen elephants before and dared not face such hideous brutes.

Thus it was that Pyrrhus defeated the forces of Rome in his first great battle against them. But his victory was won at a fearful price. Nearly 4000 of his best men were killed. He knew that but for his elephants he could not have won against Rome. And he could not count on the "monsters" to strike the same terror to Roman hearts a second time.

"Had I such soldiers as these Romans," he said, as he viewed the stricken field, "I could rule the whole world. One more such 'victory' as I have just won will ruin me."

The hopeless speech was reported to Rome, and the term "a Pyrrhic victory" sprang into existence, to denote any triumph whose results were really worse than a defeat. The phrase remains in common use to this day.

Pyrrhus was right in his prophecy. Despite his own genius as a leader he was at last driven from Italy, hopelessly beaten. He reached home with less than one-third of his army. Nor did he realize his dreams of living some day in peace and comfort. For while fighting in Sparta he was mortally wounded by a tile thrown down upon his head, by a woman, from a housetop. He is said to have begged one of his soldiers to stab him in the heart, that he, a great warrior, might not suffer the disgrace of dying at a woman's hands.

Slang Tabooed.

Slang is tabooed in the home of a West Philadelphia family, principally because there is a bright little girl who displays a persistent aptitude in retaining expressive but uncultured phrases.

The other evening at dinner the mother, father and daughter drifted into the vernacular, and a fresh start was necessary. The little girl started it "I'm not stuck on this bread," she remarked.

"Margie" said her mother, "you want to cut that slang out."
"That's a peach of a way of correcting the child," commented the father.

"I know," replied the mother, "but I just wanted to put her wise."

"I wish you would tell me the secret of your blooming appearance." The speaker was a pretty but jaded, nervous looking matron. She was talking to a woman, her contemporary in age, but who was certainly, as she expressed it, more blooming in appearance.

"Perhaps it is because I know when I am tired and you don't," suggested her companion.

"Do not know when I am tired?" complained the first. "Why shouldn't I know when I am tired?"

"Well, you don't," reiterated the blooming one, "because at every meal you drink coffee or tea, with 5 o'clock tea introduced between times and perhaps a glass of wine at a social gathering. Between all these stimulants, or food adjuncts, as they are called in diet kitchens, your physical strength is constantly being spurred on to over-exertion. I, who drink only water with my meals, know exactly where I stand physically."

"When I am tired I know it is nature's warning to stop, and I usually obey. But I have the compensation of knowing when I rise in the morning full of vigor that it is strength, not stimulant, and if under these normal conditions I continue to feel exhausted then I know there is something wrong with the bodily machinery and set to work to rectify the trouble. It is literally true that half the time American women do not know how they feel, and their average condition is that of overexhaustion, buoyed artificially to strenuous effort."

When Too Lazy to Massage.
If too indifferent to give your hair a nightly massage, invest in one of the shampoo brushes and rub in tonic frequently.

These brushes look like a giant toothbrush with bristles three and a half inches long, a half inch wide and about two inches deep. They should be stiff and closely set, so as to get good friction.

Moisten with the tonic, first parting the hair into strands, and rub vigorously, but not so as to tear the scalp.

Circulation is stirred up quickly and easily and without the physical effort of self massage.

If the hair is parted in the middle from the forehead to the nape of the neck and brushed with a smooth even stroke from the part to the ends of the hair it will get the luster that is so much to be desired just now.

Would You Be Beautiful?
If you would preserve a fresh complexion be free in your use of green vegetables and plenty of salad.

If you would preserve your face from disfiguring lines avoid yielding to irritable moods and peevish tempers. These if frequently indulged in leave permanent traces of their handiwork.

A favorite prescription of the fair dames of olden days for use upon the face was made as follows: With an ounce of sheep's fat mingle an ounce of sweet oil and add to it a drop of the best attar of roses. Heat the two ingredients first mentioned well together and add the attar of roses when the mixture is very nearly cold. Nowadays we consider animal fat a hair grower and pin our faith to cold cream and vegetable oils.

Almond Oil For the Nails.
Sweet almond oil is the application which one woman uses for her finger nails. According to her theory, which is demonstrated as far as she is concerned, cold cream, which is excellent, is not sufficiently penetrating, and with oil she has better results in keeping the cuticle soft and smooth and the nails transparent in quality.

Her method includes a preliminary rubbing of the entire hands in almond oil if they be soiled or cold when preparing for the night. Cold skin is liable to crack, and she considers, with correctness, that an application of grease will prevent any such trouble. It is washed off after a few moments in warm water with soap.

Eye-brow Grower.
Vaseline is rather overestimated as an eye-brow grower. To begin with, it attaches itself to the hair and is not readily absorbed by the pores of the scalp, where the nourishment is really needed. An excellent hair grower that may be used on the eyebrows is made by combining four ounces of alcohol with two ounces of castor oil and adding a few drops of oil of bergamot. Apply this to the eyebrows every night with a tiny brush. A little massage every night with the finger tips will aid the good work of the tonic. Once a week bathe the eyebrows carefully with green soap and warm water.

A Good Emergency Sachet.
A wad of cotton well sprinkled with scent and dropped into a box of jaboos or scarfs provides a very good emergency sachet and can be constantly renewed so as to obviate any fear of the scent becoming stale, while to scent the hair delicately a little sachet of the finest and faintest perfume is sometimes inserted in the crown of the hat just underneath the lining.
