

after his birth, leaving him, with two older brothers, to the care of their widowed mother. He early showed a hardy, self-relying nature, and when but a boy he shouldered a musket in the war of independence. With the versatility of employment peculiar to the progressive character of the new republican empire, he became a lawyer as well as a soldier. This latter was the character in which he was to reap his great renown. In 1790, he fixed his residence in Nashville and married. In 1795, he assisted in forming the Constitution of Tennessee, and was sent to Congress as the first representative from the new State. In 1797, he took his seat as a senator of the United States. He soon after left the senate, and was appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Tennessee. In 1804, he resigned that office and retired to 'the Hermitage,' his residence near Nashville. In 1812, when war with Great Britain was proclaimed, Jackson commanded the militia of his district. In 1814 he was made a major-general, and in 1815 obtained the victory of New Orleans. Three years later, in 1818, he made a successful campaign against the Southern Indians. In 1821 he was appointed, by the President, governor of Florida (then a territory); and in 1823, the place of minister to Mexico was tendered to him; this he declined, but again entered the national legislature as a senator from Tennessee. In 1824 he was voted for by many as President, but was not elected. In 1828 he was called to that high office by a very large majority; and was re-elected in 1832. In the spring of 1837 he withdrew from public life, and spent the residue of his days at 'the Hermitage,' where he died on the 8th of June, 1845, at the age of 78.
