He has given pany. Upon certain conditions a portion of this fund may be used for the benefit of others who are in distress. Many millions more are to be given to establish libraries to furnish reading matter for the masses of the people. Thus we see that this man, after amassing great wealth, is now devoting the closing years of his life to disposing of his property in ways that shall be most beneficial to mankind. Carnegie's course rscalls the answer of an old Russian minister who, when pressed for his reason for doing certain things, replied; "Wait for my death before you judge my life." If all would follow this in speaking of their fellow man there would be fewer harsh and unjust judgments. But suppose Carnegie had not given his wealth away, but had continued on to the end of his life a busy, active man of affairs. Does it follow that he should her permanent home. be condemned simply because he became rich? In gaining wealth for himself did he not of necessity give many others an an opportunity to become rich?
