Burning Weeds.

It is the custom of many farmers to burn over land before plowing in the spring, if it is covered with many weeds, dead grass, stubble or trash. Different opinions prevail in regard to the wisdom of this custom. I know many good, practical farmers who follow and advocate it. It renders the work of plowing and pulverizing the soil much easier; it leaves the ground much more mellow than when the trash is plowed under; the crops start more promptly and vigorously, and a multitude of weed seeds are destroyed. It is urged that when the trash and stubble are burned the nitrogen they contain is all wasted and that the continuance of the practice will therefore tend to impoverish the soil, requiring the use of fertilizers to replace the nitrogen. Practical observation is always better than theory, provided the observation is continued through a sufficient number of years. One farmer argues that he has tried burning over land for a number of years and found it beneficial; another answers that the benefit was only temporary, while the injury caused by the waste of nitrogen will certainly be apparent sooner or later. That there is, in many cases, an immediate beneficial effect from burning, I think is beyond question. I have observed, not only on the farm, but also while traveling on the railroad, that where grass and weeds by the roadsides had been accidentally burned off, the young grass came up in the spring earlier and more vigorously than elsewhere. I attribute this to the fertilizing effects of the ashes which were washed into the soil by rains. It is true the ashes contain nothing but what was in the plants burned, but being usually in a very fine condition, the plant food contained is promptly available, while the dead plants would lie on the soil a long time before the mineral food they contained would be available. On the farm I think the beneficial effect is due partly to the prompt fertilizing effects of the ashes, and partly to the fact that when the trash is burned off the soil is usually put in better condition. It must be remembered that the ashes from a ton of trash on a field are worth a great deal more than the ashes from a ton of wood. Also, that when trash is burned in the spring, owing to the dampness, a considerable portion of the carbon is left in the form of fine charcoal, which would have, in many cases, a very beneficial effect. "But how about the waste of nitrogen?" I greatly doubt if the nitrogen contained in the trash on a field in March or April is worth considering. The nitrogen in plants is either in the form of nitrates or organic nitrogenous compounds. The nitrates are exceedingly soluble and would be all leached out by the rains and showers of winter. The nitrogenous organic matter is apt to undergo decomposition. For the reasons given above I am of the opinion that farmers may burn over their fields before plowing in the spring, without any fear of wasting nitrogen. Of course there may be soils, such as very retentive clays, which would be benefited by plowing under trash.—[Correspondence in Chronicle.

Work Horses.

An correspondent writing in regard to work horses says: "A farmer cannot do a full day's work with a horse that he has caught up from the grass in the morning. If he is cultivating he will have to give them a long nooning and quit early at night. This is quite an item, especially if he has hired help and wants to get in full time. Then, too, it won't do to lag with the work while the weather is uncertain. It is an easy matter to lose $25 in the crop by slack cultivating, and that would go far toward keeping a team through the season. And again it will take an extra amount of grain to get them up into working order in the fall. Everything considered, I think it economy to keep the team up through the summer, if there are many day's work to be done."—[Cleveland(O) Herald.

In summer, when the ground is dry. Our wayward minds impressing With what is meet—what we should buy—Light calf skin is a blessing. Go to Dean & Huntington's—They will fit and please you; They keep every thing, From stout boots for winter, To light ones for spring.
