Dealing with Untruthful Customers.
 The following from a correspondence to the American Merchant should be heeded and the rule adopted by all merchants:

In my opinion merchants ought to meet each other at least once a month to expose the dead beats who make a habit of going from store to store and beating the retail merchants out of goods. By holding such meetings there is another class of customers that you can find out, and a class which does much more harm to legitimate profits of storekeepers than most of them have an idea of. I mean the lying class, who, whenever you sell them an article, no matter with how small a profit, tell you that Mr. So-and-So sells that article for so much, when you positively know the article cost more than he says the other party offered it to him for. Many storekeepers will say to themselves, "Well if he can afford to do it I can, too," and thus they are induced to sell an article that costs three dollars a dozen for twenty-five cents, just because the lying customer says that somebody else does it. At the same time he wonders how the other merchant can afford to sell goods in that way and pay rent, clerk hire, living expenses, etc. The parties who do this can be very easily found out by making a note of the name of any customer who comes in that way, and putting down the name of the article that he says he bought and the price of anything that he says can be bought cheaper than you can sell it yourself, and also the name of the merchant, and in your monthly meeting you can discuss this matter quietly and you can find out the parties who make a habit of doing this. In this way you can stop the practice, for you will know the purpose when such a customer starts the little game with you, and thereby make a living profit on your goods.

This is a serious matter, and every merchant will find it so for himself if he just thinks of it seriously for awhile. In no other way that I can think of can the merchants of a place break up serious inroads on business as by meeting once a month and finding out the chronic dead-beats and lying customers.

Only yesterday I found out and caught one of these liars. He came in and wanted to buy a file that cost me $3.50 per dozen. I asked him 40 cents for it. "Why," he said, "I just bought one a few days ago from— for 30 cents." "I told him I could not, by any means, afford to sell mine for that price, and he left. I then sat down and wrote a note to the proprietor of that store and told him that— had come to my store and said that he bought a certain file of a certain clerk in his store for 30 cents. The merchant called up his clerk and asked him if he had sold that file for 30 cents. The clerk denied it, and said that he had sold it for 40 cents, and said, "Bring him to my place and see if he denies it." Thus was his customer exposed. This morning who should come in my store but the man who could buy a file for 30 cents a few blocks off, and he bought the same kind of file from me for 40 cents. You see that, by exposing the trick to all the merchants, it will stop the practice when buyers see that their game will not work.

The Coquille City brass band chartered the Little Annie last Saturday, and loading her down with friends from various points on the river had an excursion to Bandon, where, after one of Tupper's dinners, they dispersed themselves about over the pebbly beach until evening, when they boarded the steamer for Hamlock's where about forty couples joined in the dance. The band boys discoursed sweet music at frequent intervals and displayed a degree of proficiency hardly to be expected in so young an organization.—Recorder.

Money in the Kitchen Garden.
 A well-kept half-acre in garden-truck will furnish half the living of the farmer's family. An ill-kept one is a costly nuisance. In an article on this subject the New England Farmer gives good advice as follows: A good garden should have, if possible, a variety of land, warm and early, and moist and late, to give early and late crops. It should be well drained if too wet, and should be cleared from stones, so that the plow can be run deep and without being obstructed in its course. If any land will pay for heavy manuring it is the land used for garden. Rich land will often push crops along faster than the myriads of insects can destroy them. Plant nearly or quiet every thing in rows, far enough apart for the horse and cultivator to run between them. This will make the garden cultivation little more expensive than the cultivation of field crops.
