Washington Letter.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)
Washington, D. C., Mar. 28.
Since I last wrote you, the vexed question of Inter-State Commerce commissioners has been settled, and the little army of ignored applicants who waited in suspense for recognition from the president, has had to content itself as best it could. The five lawyers selected for the new national court have been thoroughly dissected, discussed, viewed from every standpoint, and finally pronounced good. The commission will now organize and enter upon its duties.

The next trouble in connection with it is in finding a home for the new bureau. That devolves upon Secretary Lamar, and the Interior department is already overworked.

The president pronounced the construction of this commission the most perplexing problem yet encountered by him in his present office, and the universal praise accorded to his selection gives him much gratification. But the commissioners cannot fail to have a hard time at best. They are good and able men, but their labors will be complex, comprehensive and exacting beyond description, and they have an immense puzzle to work out in the new law. Jay Gould said it was a good thing that they were all lawyers, for they would get out of the law all there was in it.

The effect of the new law upon Washington will be to greatly increase the activity of the coming summer. A large bureau must be rapidly organized, a clerical and official force employed, and thousands of persons interested in questions coming before the Commission will swoop down upon it even before it is ready to receive them. The clerical force of the Inter-State Commission will not come under civil service rules. The Commissioners could, it is said, place the organization of their clerical force under these rules, but it is not probable that they will voluntarily surrender the power of selection and appointment vested in them.

The president's next difficult task will be to construct a Commission to investigate the Pacific Railroads. It is predicted that he will have even more trouble in finding the right men for these places than he had in selecting the Inter-State Commerce commissioners.

It is now regarded as a settled fact that Mr. Fairchild, the assistant secretary, will be promoted to the secretaryship of the treasury, and that his appointment will be officially announced this week. The selection of Mr. Fairchild is the outcome of an interesting political experiment. The president declared his desire to wipe out sectional prejudices in financial matters, by the appointment of a popular leader of his party in the West or South, qualified to assume the task.

The president was doubtless sincere in his purpose, and endeavored to find a popular leader who was a practical financier, and willing to assume the responsibility of controlling the national finances for the next two years. But he did not succeed. The desired statesman either was not found or was not willing to serve, and the president, after offering to sacrifice personal preference, and to make an appointment in compliance with political dictation, has returned to Mr. Fairchild.

The Kit Carson Post, G. A. R., held its twentieth anniversary camp fire at the National Rifles Armory a few evenings ago, and the commissioner of pensions, who was one of the speakers, charmed his hearers with his eloquence. The soldier was his subject, and the American volunteer soldier probably never was exhibited in a more heroic light that was turned upon him by Gen. Black. This reminds me of an old soldier's recent good fortune. He had been a private in an Indiana company, was totally blind, and had been a regular visitor at the pension office every day for more than two months, so that the clerks in the office of the chief clerk, where he always presented himself, had come to take an interest in him.

One Monday morning he was rather late making his appearance and said that he had about given up all hope. But the Saturday before he had been granted an arrears pension of more than $11,000, and the clerks gathered around him to see how he would take the good news. Tears of joy ran down the old man's haggard, thin face, and he rejoiced and wept for nearly an hour. He had never dreamed of half so much money before. After living for years on his pension of $8 a month, he was made a rich man. The lady clerks were so much affected by the old man's emotion that they wept with him and for a time there was not a dry eye in the room.

"Traveler" sends us two subscriptions and the following items from Gravel Ford: Farmers are busy plowing and putting in crops; vegetation of all kinds growing fast; stock getting fat. . . . G. G. Swan has gone to the canyon to boss the work on the road. I guess there will be no more grumbling about the mail.
