PROHIBITION. All Sorts of Comments—Timely Thoughts and Fugitive Hints Touching the Great Issue.

This prohibition campaign is a sort of go as you please affair. Being divorced from partisan politics, and constituting an issue on its own merits, it is independent of all merely temperance cliques, combinations and interests. No temperance faction or organization, or all of them combined can claim special credit for the success of the prohibition amendment. Were its success dependent upon such aids, or upon the support of the church and all of the temperance organizations combined, it would fail as all spasmodic efforts specially championed and handled by their influence have failed in the past. The preacher and the straight-jacket temperance "reformer" are too impractical—too "holier than thou"—in their methods to accomplish affirmative results in a campaign that must enlist the interest and challenge the sober, sound thought, of the great body of the fair-minded, conservative people in order to succeed. This amendment business is to be piloted to a successful issue by the disinterested efforts of that large class of our people who know whereof they affirm when they say it will be greatly to the interest of the great mass of our population to close the saloons.

The anti-prohibitionists have a literary bureau at Des Moines, Iowa, whence emanate most of the editorials and misleading statistics which find their way into the columns of the subsidized whisky organs of the country and which are copied into and re-echoed by that portion of the unsubsidized press which makes war upon prohibition from the stand-point of honest, unbridled convictions.

The combined whisky and beer interests of the whole country have contributed a part of $25,000 to inaugurate the publication of a first-class daily newspaper at Atlanta, Georgia, to break down and secure the repeal of the "local option" law of that state. What will those voters in Oregon who would have preferred "local option" to prohibition say to this, especially in the light of the (of course) insincere protestations of the whisky men here that they would not object to the "local option" or high license.

The stock argument sent out from the literary bureau run by the whisky men, and harped upon and reiterated by the friends of open saloons in plenty, and believed by many good people, is that prohibition cannot be enforced! Well, it would be a marvel indeed if it should be, or could be, enforced to the letter, since no single law of the many laws on the statute book, is, or can be, so enforced; there would be little need of law among a people capable of enforcing all laws with certainty and fidelity. The advocates of prohibition do not promise to usher in the millennium with the success of prohibition. All that can be hoped for by the advocates of the measure is, that it will be reasonably enforced; this is all that can be vouched for in behalf of any law, since it is notorious that all laws are, and are always liable to be, disregarded and violated by these lawless and semi-lawless inhabitants of this earth of ours. But there is one feature to this claim that prohibition cannot be enforced, which should engage the serious thoughts of law-abiding people, and that is, that it is inspired by the class engaged in the manufacture and vending of the things to be prohibited, and is tantamount to the impudent threat in advance to defy all such laws as shall not square with their ideas and interests. This assumption is dwelt upon in the pamphlets issued by the brewers of Portland as proof of the folly of the people of this American commonwealth injecting into their organic law features repugnant to the interests of them, the brewers of Portland aforesaid. And when it is reflected upon that the great majority of the brewers of this as well as of the other states are foreigners, who profess to have sought our shores to escape the tyranny of "Fadder Land," the suggestion cannot but obtrude itself upon ones mind that it was not liberty, but license, these fellows were in quest of when they came here. And a manifest disposition on the part of any considerable per cent. of our foreign born population to evade and disregard our laws, will not be very considerably calculated to disparage the success of the "American Party" now in process of formation in several states, and which is notably aggressive and outspoken in California.

One hundred and seventy-two thousand votes were cast in Texas for prohibition—nearly all of them by the native-born white residents of that state. An analysis of the vote printed in the Chicago News credits the negroes (who went anti almost in a body) and the foreign-born element with defeating the measure.

Every steamer that reaches Portland from now on to the election in November will bring roughs and bullies to aid the home contingent in that city to overawe and override the prohibition vote of Multnomah county. In this manner will the San Francisco Liquor Dealers League undertake to carry out its pledge long since made, to "take care of Oregon!" Legal, honest, bona fide electors of the Web-foot state, how do you relish the prospect?

A scheme is on foot to run hundreds of repeaters out of Louisville over the line into Tennessee to defeat prohibition in that state. Indianapolis showed its criminal element, over into Detroit the day prohibition was voted upon in Michigan, while the whisky interest in Chicago was pouring its vagabond element over from that direction.

The necessity and desirability of the closing of the saloons is apparent not alone from the stand-point of morality and humanity, for these are economic aspects of the question which ought to appeal in audible tones to the thoughtful and prudent majority in this state. Nonproducers are consumers, and therefore drones in the great industrial hive, who must be supported off the labor of those who work, thereby increasing their burdens. Doctors, lawyers, preachers and merchants are nonproducers, but these seem to be necessary evils and their support is not, therefore, deemed necessarily a hardship. But the great army of idlers who infest the saloons constitute a class of nonproducers for which the country can have no use, and are, for that reason, an unmitigated curse entailed upon mankind by the saloon system. The saloon fosters idleness and all the train of vices which are the necessary and inevitable complement of idleness. Gambling, drunkenness, licentiousness, etc., are the concomitants of idleness, and the saloon is the retreat of the idleness. Production is the basis of all wealth, and the greater the numbers of producers—workers—the larger will be the common stock of wealth; hence, the fewer the nonproducers, the better for all concerned.

A very manifest fallacy finds supporters, viz: That one never knew a place to amount to much that had no saloons! Many persons accept this anachronism without so much as the inquiry: How the devil is it possible for a saloon or any number of saloons to promote the prosperity of a town or country? In this as in many other things, the effect is mistaken for the cause. There must be some show of prosperity lurking about a town to tempt a saloon to enter it. The same line of reasoning that could be tortured into dividing honors with the saloons for whatever of prosperity may environ a town will apply with equal cogency to the Jew. The fact that a Jew sets up in a place is evidence in some sort, of prosperity—money—being conceivable there. Jews are proverbial for giving places a wide berth whereat money is scarce. They come not to bring money into a town, but to take it away. They produce nothing, neither does the saloon, with this advantage in favor of the Jew, that he does not arrest production, while the saloon does, in this that, in so far as its existence promotes idleness and unreliability among the workers, it actually subtracts from the sum-total of production an amount equal to the capacity of the workers so rendered idle and unreliable to produce. In the great judgment day when the responsibility for the Chinese invasion which has cursed and does curse the Pacific Coast shall be apportioned out among all and several of the guilty agencies conspiring thereat, we tremble for the fate of the saloon.

Monopoly is a curse to any country on which its blighting presence is inflicted, and this curse is largely entailed by and through the agency of the saloon, since, in the very nature of things, the habit of excessive drinking begets in providence and waste, thereby rendering the victims of the habit helpless and an easy prey in the hands of the sordid, grasping mercenary few who, taking advantage of the necessities of the helpless, acquire an undue proportion of the wealth of the country.

The farmers and rural people generally, ought to hail the advent of prohibition with a degree of concern quite beyond computation. They have the bulk of the taxes for the support of the state and county to pay, hence, whatever may tend to reduce the sum-total required, relieves them by so much. That the criminal and pauper charge upon production is largely referable to whisky goes without the saying; and this is not all. They all (the rural people) have to pay tribute to Portland in many ways, the aggregate sum of which tribute is largely enhanced by reason of whisky. To maintain the police department of Portland costs the business of that city an immense annual sum, and doable what it would cost but for whisky. Insurance upon merchandise is abnormally expensive on the same account. Rents are high because property owners must pay high taxes and exorbitant insurance, a large per cent. of which is attributable to whisky. Transportation companies which hand the farmer's produce to market pay high charges toward police expenses in Portland. The farmer is therefore made to contribute of his substance toward reimbursing transportation companies for their city expenses, in the way of high freight charges, while, in the same manner, he is made to pay upon his purchase of implements and machinery, his family supplies, etc., a sum above the value of such goods, sufficient to make the Portland jobber whole upon his extra expenses of doing business in that city in the matter of taxes, rents and insurance go, it will readily be seen, that whatever may operate to reduce business expenses in any city, operates to that extent in lessening the burdens of the country customer. The rule applies to all towns, that, whatever enhances the expenses of doing business, enhances the cost to the consumer of all commodities purchased therein.

"High license," or "local option," is commended to the voters of Oregon by the whisky advocates as preferable to prohibition, yet these same advocates are always found opposing high license or local option when these questions are up for discussion on their own separate merits. And then if high license may be believed so efficacious in ridding the world of its ills, why enact any prohibitory laws whatever? Why not put the license so high on murder that no one can afford to kill? On horse stealing so high as to be "prohibitory"? Why not close up all the bagnios and opium dens by the application to these institutions of the high license theory? As for "local option," that is prohibition or it is nothing. And why should any given county inaugurate local prohibition while in all of the other counties the traffic may go on.

It is urged that to the family and church the question of whisky should be referred! Why have not these agencies done away with all necessity for penal statutes of any sort if they may be supposed able to grapple successfully with the giant of evils, whisky?

While all who oppose prohibition are not roughs, it is safe to count upon all of the roughs as opposing it.

It is asserted that the adoption of prohibition is one step in advance toward "Church and State," yet in all of the states where prohibition has prevailed religious liberty is the most pronounced.

Opponents of prohibition have to labor under the disadvantage of having to concede the wrong of the whisky traffic.

No matter how high the license; adulterants will be increased so as to maintain the "regulation" profits, and the mills will grind on. For instance, the Federal Government imposes a very high license in addition to 90 cents per gallon on the manufacture of whisky, besides a high license on the wholesaler and $25 per annum on the smallest retailer, and yet the consumption of the article is on the increase, the consumption last year in the United States amounting to the enormous total of SEVEN HUNDRED MILLION DOLLARS! And in proof that adulteration will keep pace with apparent enhanced cost of intoxicants, it is only necessary to state that whisky can actually be had in San Francisco for 90 cents a gallon, the exact revenue charge per gallon of the Government, saying nothing about the high license manufacturer, and wholesaler, and retailer have to pay besides.

Thirty counties in Missouri have adopted local option, yet the people of these counties must go on contributing toward the expenses entailed upon the state by the continued "business" in the rest of the counties and in all the larger cities. There is nothing fair, or equal, or just in local option.

One of the objections urged to prohibition is, that it violates individual rights! If so, how so? Until it can be shown that it is right to do wrong there will be nothing in such a plea.

Interferences in our elections have become a favorite pastime with the whisky interests; and this interference is purely presumptuous and interested. They care nothing for either party only in so far as they may hope to use such party to further the interest of whisky. No public measure challenges their support that does not promise to keep whisky on top.

The bible is made to do service in aid of the "business," and both holy and unholy writ are invoked in behalf the use of and traffic in, intoxicants, the promoters of whisky being apparently unmindful of the fate of slavery, which institution toppled to its fall soon after it was sought to associate it with the scriptures.
