East Marshfield.

The promising townsite of East Marshfield is attracting a great deal of attention on the bay just now, and a word about it would be opportune at this time. Last Saturday Mr. Coberg, the gentlemanly agent in charge, showed a HERALD representative all over the site, and he acknowledges that an eighteen year's residence in the county, and a part of the time spent in Marshfield, had not qualified him to judge of this lovely place as a location for a city. It is situated east of Marshfield and gets its name from its direction and proximity to the county's metropolis. It is bounded on the south by Isthmus slough where it has a good, substantial wharf; on the west by Coos bay proper and on the north by Coos river and Cutching slough, thus forming a horse-shoe-like exterior. The ground is sufficiently rolling to admit of excellent drainage, and the best of water is obtained at a depth of twenty (20) feet. The streets are eighty feet wide and the alleys twenty feet, thus giving the place the metropolitan appearance in that regard that it is supposed to maintain in all in the near future. There is ample room for a city of twenty thousand people, exclusive of an extensive tide flat on the south and west which is being sold readily for factory sites, mills and business locations. Upon the whole East Marshfield is destined to make a city and the rival that gets away with her will have to get on a good move. The buildings going up show in every stick and timber an abiding faith in its future by the settler's there.

That the railroad from that place to the Clawson place below Beaver slough on this river is to be commenced very soon and rushed to completion, its rapid occupation may be readily assumed.

Nor Right.—It turns out now that John Nasburg, T. J. Davis and Johnny Manning after their very commendable efforts in establishing an oyster bed in Coos bay have to fight a large, rich corporation, the Glasgow townsite company, to maintain it, and the opposition, it is claimed, is purely westerly. Right is right, no matter who the parties are affected, whether rich or poor, high or low, or what not. In this instance, it is said that the company, instead of stopping when it got its wharf piling to the channel, kept right straight on across the middle ground and oyster bed till stopped by the strong arm of the law. We trust that right and justice will prevail, and that Glasgow may thrive and prosper with and by, and not to the exclusion of established enterprises, this one of which, though proven to have been established but fifteen months, promises so much.
