Leasing of Government Land.

There are now before Congress several bills providing for the leasing of government land, but in none of these can be found sufficient merit to justify their passage, and all of them contain objectionable features, the greatest of which is the tendency they would have to retard the settlement of the western states, by imposing upon the actual settler who should arrive after the lease of the land had been secured by a prior settler, land owner or corporation, additional hardship and disadvantages. We are all aware of the fact that the life of the poor man who goes upon unimproved government land to build himself a home is not the easiest life in the world. The hardships, endured by him are numerous and when there is placed upon him the additional hardship and disadvantage of restricting him to the narrow confines of his 160-acre homestead and refusing him the privilege of grazing his few head of stock upon the public domain, because some settler or corporation has a lease upon it, we are placing him at a disadvantage that he can not well bear.

The opportunities which these bills offer to the homesteaders and small farmer are practically of no value whatever, and would be a very great disadvantage if the government land were leased by a large company or corporation, as it naturally be, while the large stock companies it would offer opportunities which at first glance are not appreciated. They could lease the land and thereby prevent any settler from grazing cattle upon it, and by so doing monopolize large tracts of land which it is now impossible to do, as all have an equal right upon it. The act of February 25, 1885, now in force, prohibits the fencing or in any manner restricting the free use by all of the public domain.

Some of these bills are exceptionally objectionable while all contain features that are sufficient to warrant their defeat.

The bill introduced by Senator Millard contains numerous objections, the greatest of which is that the amount of land allowed each lessee is only limited by the amount of land he may own, each lessee being allowed to lease 10 acres for every acre he owns. There would practically be no limit to the quantity of land that might be leased under this law by the large stock companies who own thousands of acres of land throughout the west.

Another objection is that no other than homestead or mineral entries might be made upon land under lease and this would practically exclude all desert entries and entries under the timber and stone law.

The revenue derived from the lease of these lands under this bill is to be applied to the irrigation of lands in the different public land states, but as the land is to be rented only two cents per acre, the revenue would not begin to compensate for the injury it would cause the homesteader. In fact, no sum would be sufficient to pay for the injury necessarily resulting to the people as a whole from an act which would retard the settlement of the western states.

It would seem from the amount of energy that is being expended upon this effort to frame a satisfactory leasing bill that it would have been done if such a thing were possible, but so far we have failed to learn of a plan which is not open to the above objections and we conclude therefore that the efforts to mix oil and water will surely fail.

And until a bill is framed for the leasing of the public land that will be of as much or more benefit to the homestead settler as to the large stock corporations we can not conscientiously support it.—Public Land.
