On Monday morning the jury put in an appearance and the work has been going along nicely, but owing to the crowded condition of our columns, we will be unable to give the proceedings before our next issue. What might have proved to be a serious if not fatal accident occurred at Lyons mill at this place yesterday. Dale Strange was down under the mill repairing some of the belt tighteners, when by some means the blue jumper he was wearing caught on the Main shaft that runs the large saw. Quicker than it takes to read this sentence he was caught on the revolving shaft, and had his jumper and shirt not given away, he would have been instantly killed. As it was he came out with a dislocated shoulder, some bruises and abrasions only. The shoulder was reduced and the doctor dressed him up in good shape, and to the pleasure of all Dale is all right today. He will rest a few days before resuming work in the mill. While Mr. Page and his men were putting the boiler and engine of the new sawmill on board of a scow to day it got a little advantage of them and was about to fall into the river, when Capt. Bert McCloskey who with his steamer, the Beta, was rendering assistance, attempted to push his boat out of the way and came near being crushed by the heavy machine. He was slightly bruised and his clothes torn but not seriously hurt. They managed to get the scow in shallow water before the boiler got off, which will be raised with but little trouble.
