National Irrigation.

Extract from speech of Hon. Paris Gibson, of Montana, in the Senate of the United States, Thursday, March 24, 1904.

The rapid increase in our popu-lation, together with the enactment of the national irrigation measure, have the last two or three years greatly stimulated the taking up of our choicest public lands in large tracts in the arid and semiarid States, and consequently agricul-States, and consequently agrical-tural lands, whether irrigable or nonirrigable, have in that time rap-idly advanced in value. These facts should lead the Government to prompt action in repealing the de-sert-land act and the commutation clause of the homestead act, as well as the forest reserve lieu land ret, if it would save the remaining public land for inhabitancy.

Our present system of land laws is all that could be desired if it is the part of wisdom to give the ownership and control of the land in eight or ten States of the Union to a few men and companies, who will use them for cattle ranges, rather than hold them for millions of homeless American citizens.

Under pastoral stock raising there will never be large numbers of cattle in the Rocky Mountain States, but if farmers can occupy that country, which will surely be the case under a wise and just national policy, its live-stock interests after a while will assume immense proportions.

In proof of this I have only to Port Arthur. state that according to the last census Iowa, a farming State, having 55,000 square miles, had 500,-States and Territories covering an area of 821,000 square miles.

The continuance of our present system of land laws result in the ownership by landlords of the principal part of the arid States, whereas if held subject to a homeof freeholders.
