She'd Nothing to Say.

Two distinguished citizens up in Vermont engaged in a little fishbait the other day, and the reporter of the daily paper was sent to interview a lady who had chanced to witness the affair from her porch.

"That is right," said the reporter, blandly, "stick to that. No one can make you talk if you don't want to."

"I know that," said the lady, "and I'm not going to mix myself up in a little disagreement between my neighbors. Both of the gentlemen are neighbors and friends of mine, and I wouldn't for the world speak a word against either of them, for one was just as much to blame as the other, as far as I could see, and I saw the whole affair from beginning to end, and could tell every word that was said if I wanted to. But I've nothing to say about it, and that's the end of it."

"That is right," the wily reporter said. "I admire your discretion and your fidelity to your friends."

"Well, if I do say it myself, I'm a woman that can hold my tongue when I want to. No one but me saw the affair and I don't choose to speak of it. I'd be ashamed to tell that two such prominent gentlemen as Major Dilley and Captain Barker fell out over a bet they'd made at the Fourth of July races. The major said that Fleetwood won the race fairly, and Captain Barker said that the other horse won, and that was all there was of it. I'd not tell that two friends of mine called each other all kinds of frightful names and that the major hit the captain with his cane, and that they clinched then and rolled over and over on the ground and fought and swore awfully. I've simply nothing to say about it. It would mortify the major, I know, if I told that he cried 'ouff first, and Captain Barker's wife is too good a friend of mine for me to tell that her husband jumped another man's head on the plank walk and swore at him. No, sir, you may as well go. I've made up my mind to simply say nothing about it, and forty horses couldn't draw a word out of me if I won't want to tell it."

"I believe you, madam," said the hardened reporter, blandly. "I respect your discretion, and will not trouble you any further."

And when a complete account of the affair appeared in the morning, the lady said:

"Well, who on earth could have told that reporter about it! He never got a word of it from me. I just told him I'd nothing to say, and I didn't."—San Diego Coronado.

ARNOLDS LACK OF HUMOR.

His incapacity to appreciate a joke illustrated.

When Matthew Arnold was in Boston he made some remarks in familiar conversation which showed strikingly his lack of sense of humor which he betrays in his article in the Nineteenth Century. It was a well known literary and artistic club that this defect in his intellectual makeup was made manifest. One of the members had told a story which the late James T. Field, who was a mild humorist in his way, used to relate of his experience in a western town where he had delivered a lecture on some old authors. He said that after the lecture an old farmer, who had become somewhat confused by his mingling personal reminiscences of Wordsworth with literary associations with Pope, and he was thus led to think that Mr. Fields was a contemporary of all the writers upon whom he discoursed, came up to him and asked: "Was you personally acquainted with Dryden?"

Every person who heard the story with the exception of Mr. Arnold, at once recognized the humorous inventiveness displayed in it, but the apostle of "sweetness and light" took it as a literal fact, and exclaimed: "How unpleasant! I had no idea that there was so little appreciation of chronology in literature among lecture audiences as Mr. Fields found." On this occasion, also, I could not but notice the self-complacency with which Mr. Arnold uttered his fluent judgments on every subject that was talked about. But though his manner was hard and dry with no touch of the sympathetic quality which is so delightful in a man of letters, I felt after hearing his comment on Mr. Fields' story; that he deserved pity rather than rebuke. Nothing but trepanning could have led any humor into his brain, and with his constant regard for the propriety of the operation would have been too risky to have justified the attempt, though it was the last chance of brightening his outlook upon literature and life.

FASHION FADS.

The best styles are the most simple. Pink shades of terra cotta are quite the rage.

Gentlemen's watch chains are short and heavy.

The largest round hats are a perfect garden of flowers.

French chaffie polonaises are draped over skirts of moire.

Narrow tucks run by hand are used as trimming for summer dresses of thin and transparent material.

Table napkins of the finest linen are elaborated with awana work, and others for fruit have exquisitely tinted borders.

Little boys' spring overcoats are long, of striped or checked cloth in brown or gray shades, finished with a deep cape.

Crepe lisse parasols formed of a succession of tiny plaitings have costly and beautiful handles set with semi-precious stones. They are to be carried only on elegant dress occasions.

The new Suede glove in French gray tints, which are important to take the place of tan shades, are generally finished on the back with very narrow white stitching.

Plain corsages are no longer popular. No matter how simple the skirt of a costume may be the waist must have vest, reverse drapery or trimming of some sort in order to look stylish.

AFRAID OF GRESHAM.

Desperate efforts of the Democrats to injure him.

CHICAGO, May 24.—A special from Washington says: Democratic politicians are preparing to make great capital out of the alleged discovery that about thirty-three years ago Judge Gresham, then 23 years of age, made a speech in Indiana in which he declared himself an American of Americans and in favor of stopping all foreign immigration. This story falls rather flat, but the Democrats say they hope by it to kill Gresham politically should he be nominated. This raking up of an insignificant relic of 1855, even if it be true, shows how hard the Democrats are working to help along the Apostle of Civil Service Reform in his rocky road this fall.

SOOTHES AND HEALS.

Santa Abie soothes and heals the membranes of throat and lungs, when poisoned and inflamed by disease. It prevents night sweats and tightness across the chest, cures coughs, croup, asthma, colds, bronchitis, pneumonia, whooping cough and all other throat and lung troubles. No other medicine is so successful in curing nasal catarrh as California Cat-R-Cure. The enormous and increasing demand for these standard California remedies confirm their merits. Sold and absolutely guaranteed by Foshay & Mason, at $1 a package.

F. Cohen has reduced the price of all his goods on account of the agitation of the tariff question.

Don't fail to see the tripods at Fort Miller & Co. They are the latest thing out in novelty furniture.

Marriage Ceremony of Princess Irene and Prince Henry.

BERLIN, May 24.—Princess Irene of Hesse, the bride of Prince Henry, arrived from Darmstadt yesterday. She was met at Charlottenburg station by the Empress Victoria and her daughters, and the crown prince and Princess Henry. A most affectionate greeting was accorded her. The route to the palace was decorated with flags and lined with people and members of the gymnasium and trade societies. Large crowds cheered enthusiastically. The emperor was asleep when the party arrived at the palace. The houses along the route were illuminated with candles, and thousands of torches were carried in the streets.
