GROWTH OF ALBANY.

The steady growth of Albany, and the rapid advancement of the city's business enterprises, is attracting no little attention abroad. In the West Shore for June we find this well written article concerning Albany's business outlook: "Citizens of Albany, Oregon, feel justly proud of the advancement their city is making this year. Last season the construction of the Oregon Pacific railway made unusually prosperous times for Albany. The volume of business increased and the general tone of trade was much better than it ever had been before. It was not surprising that business should feel the benefits which would naturally result to the headquarters of an extensive railway construction enterprise, but this was regarded somewhat in the light of a boom, a prosperity that would prove, to a large extent, transitory. It was expected that when the railroad should be completed, the increased business which its construction had caused to be brought to the city would cease, and the town would relapse into a mere staid course. This is proved to be a mistaken view of the case. Business affairs are in as good condition now as last year, when the railroad boom was supposed to be their foundation. The road is now completed to Albany from Yaquina bay, and daily trains are now run over it. No construction is now in progress within reach of Albany, but the city's progress is not in the least stayed by the removal of railroad labor. By the completion of this section of the road a more substantial basis for growth is established than ever before existed in Albany. This does not imply that it is merely a railroad town, depending upon the whim of some corporation for its prosperity. From its situation on a navigable stream and backed by a country with a variety of rich natural resources, this city is not dependent solely on the railroads; but as one of the elements which enter into business affairs in general, the railroads are justly entitled to consideration, and with the co-operation of them a wider influence is wielded and a more rapid development takes place. So, by having the railroad to Yaquina bay, the farmers of Linn county realized last fall about five cents more per bushel on their wheat than they would if that transportation line had not been in operation, though they would have raised wheat just the same if that road had not been built. Other staple products were similarly affected. In this way the railway benefits the farmers, by enabling them to get better prices for their products, and promotes the growth of the city because that is a central point for a large section of country in which the farmers, and business men in general, are eager to avail themselves of any opportunity for making the most of the results of their labor. Primarily Albany had water transportation on which to rely. Then the Oregon & California and the Portland & Willamette Valley roads came into competition for the business of the country and city, and this gave an impetus to business. Now the Oregon Pacific is added to the transportation facilities of the city, and more pronounced advancement is manifested, and there is every indication that this prosperity is of permanent character. One of the principal virtues of the new road is that it secures to Albany, not only another competing line, but a more direct route to tidewater than that part of the Willamette valley ever had before. A fine harbor at Yaquina bay permits excellent terminal facilities to be arranged, and a line of steamers takes freight from the east and transports it to the large distributing marts, or directly to the consumer. The people of Albany feel that this route to the seaboard gives them important advantages, and as the practical results of this favorable condition are manifested, reliance on coal more is a cry, and more faith is inspired in every feature of industry. "It shall not be forgotten, however, that Albany is not indebted exclusively to any one enterprise for the prosperity which it is now enjoying. It is certain that the most perfect transportation facilities would be of no avail in establishing or building up commerce were there nothing produced for which there is outside demand. The crops last year were good, and prospects this season are very encouraging. The wool clip is fully equal to that of any past season, though not much of it has yet been marketed. The stimulating effect of the advanced prices for all products is clearly manifest. The manufacturer, too, has realized an important gain and the activity which the factories of all kinds are exhibiting is gratifying. Institutions that for a long time were idle have resumed work, and important new ones are projected. Building operations on a large scale are also being carried on. Several fine large business erections are now in course of erection and others are under contract. "The growing business interests of the city have rendered organization to promote the common welfare advisable, and a board of trade was recently organized with a large membership. The object of this association, as stated in its constitution is to 'more effectually promote and develop the commercial and business interests of Albany and vicinity,' and its impetus is already felt. Some idea of the improvement which the city has made during the past year is afforded by the tax roll which was lately completed for this year. This shows the total amount of taxable property of Albany to be $1,021,906, while in 1887 the amount was only $800,212. The public improvements show an enterprising spirit in the conduct of city affairs. It is safe to calculate that Albany has embarked on a tide that will carry it on in the advancement to which its location and resources entitle it."
