THE NORTHWEST (NAVY YARD).

Oregon likely to secure the Prize From Washington.

TACOMA, (W. T.), February 12.—The naval commission to select a site for a navy yard arrived here this morning and left for Seattle. Lieutenant Mayo of the Coast and Geodetic survey, attached to the schooner Ernest lying at Olympia, has been ordered to join the commission and give the members all the information possible relative to Puget sound waters. Both Olympia and Seattle will put in strong bids for a fresh-water navy yard, and they are about the only two points on the sound where a fresh-water navy yard could be established. Nearly all the ports on the sound are in hopes of inducing the commission to recommend them to the favorable consideration of Congress, but is believed by observers here that Oregon, having more weight politically at Washington than its territory, and with have the navy yard located on the Columbia river

VAN TASSELL'S DROP.

PERSONS AND BEACH.

The Aeronaut's 1500-Foot Plunge Through Space.

"I could not have had a better day for the ascent if it had been made according to my direction," said Aeronaut Van Tassel, as he stood upon the sunny side of the Cliff-House yesterday afternoon and shaded his eyes with his hands so that he could the better see the glistening sands of the beach and the crowds of people who were slowly wending their way to where a dark object lay upon the ground a few yards from high water mark. Van Tassel had been advertised to ascend in his balloon and drop to the earth by means of a parachute, and the dark object that was attracting so much attention was the balloon.

Accompanied by James White side and followed by a curious throng, the aeronaut proceeded to where the airship lay. When they had reached the spot from which it was proposed to make the ascent, White's side sent a toy balloon aloft in order to test the direction of wind currents. The little red globe ascended several hundred times and floated out to sea. It was decided that it would be dangerous for Van Tassel to ascend at that spot, so the silted bag was lifted and carried about a half a mile inland, where it was inflated with gas.

While the bag was slowly puffing out with gas, trains were constantly arriving with people, and in a remarkable short space of time the hills in all directions were dotted over with human figures. The sun was shining brightly; old ocean was as pretty as a woman's smile; and overhead not a breath of air was stirring. As the aeronaut had tentatively said, he could not have had a better day.

In a short time all the gas on hand had been forced into the balloon, and while the air-ship was swaying to and fro as though impatient to be cut loose, it was discovered that there was not enough oxygen to be had to permit the use of a basket. With the small amount of gas to be had the balloon was not capable of lifting the extra weight of a car. This did not discourage Van Tassel, however, and he announced that he would like to make the ascent sitting on a rope, which, formed into a loop, and hanging where the car should be properly located, forming a tolerably comfortable seat.

When all was in readiness the aeronaut took his place, the ropes were cut and amid exclamations from the multitude the pretty balloon and its daring passenger sailed gracefully up towards the heavens. When he had reached an altitude of 1500 feet, Van Tassel was seen to grasp the lower ropes of his parachute and leap from his seat.

While the balloon without its passenger darted upward and floated toward the Farralton; the thousands who had watched the ascent held their breath and stilled the beating of their hearts while Van Tassel dropped like a shot for a distance of 200 feet. Then one side of the parachute commenced to spread out, but it was seen that the professor's legs had become entangled in the ropes in such a manner as to prevent the opposite side from so doing like wise. A roar of horror arose from the crowd as they saw the man's danger and everybody expected to see the aeronaut land upon the ground an unrecognizable mass.

Van Tassel gave a few quick jerks upon his legs, and when at a height of about 500 feet from the ground he succeeded in disentangling himself from the ropes. When he had accomplished that, the parachute spread itself nicely and descended to the ground in safety, Van Tassel landing on his feet as light as a bird, while the multitude testified their appreciation of his daring awakening the echoes from the hills with their cheers. Van Tassel was a little pale and said for a moment he thought he was lost.

A telephone message received at the Merchant's Exchange at about 5 o'clock from Point Lobos station was to the effect that the balloon had fallen into the ocean about eight miles down the coast, off San Pedro point. The steamer Puebla, which sailed for Port Harford yesterday afternoon, had evidently seen the balloon and was steering for it. If the signal man is right in his surmise the balloon will be taken aboard the Puebla and thence down the coast before being returned to this city.

The vegetarian society denounces the use of beef tea as an attempt to perpetuate the desire for flesh-eating. "That reminds me," said a West Point man, "of what my old professor of chemistry used to say. Professor Hendrick was fond of the good things of life and had a profound contempt for vegetarians, whom he thought foolish and ignorant. 'Don't they know,' he would add, 'that flesh is but vegetable food in a condensed form?'"
