THE GOVERNMENT AND TRADE.

In the consideration of questions involving the welfare of the people, and the prosperity of the producers of the country, it is often and indeed almost always the case that the commercial and trade interests and governmental affairs are treated as entirely distinct affairs, by some almost as antagonistic principles in human arrangement.

The facts are that governmental affairs, trade and commerce as well as the entire productive resources of the country, are or should be identical in inception, application and development. Dr. D-nslow, speaking of exchange says: "Exchange, for instance, implies private ownership or title in each of the exchanging parties, or they would have nothing to sell, and thus implies law, for the protection of title, and this again government. So exchange implies price, and price implies money, and money implies law and again law implies government. Exchange again runs back to government by another route through contracts and the collection of debts; by another through the preservation of the peace which is essential to exchange; by still another through education without which any extensive or rapid exchange is impossible; by still another through public roads, piers, docks and harbors which facilitate exchange; by another through ships, which in a certain international sense must be national property.

Here, by seven independent routes, and there are many others, exchange has its roots in government, runs back to it and could not exist without it.

But out of this relation of exchange to government and law, exchange itself leaps forward to that stage of honor which anticipates and discounts both law and government and becomes, as it were, the soul of commerce. There must be honor between merchants and creditor, between agent and principal, between banker and borrower, and finally between the exchanger and the government, whose existence underlies, in so many ways, his act of exchanging.

Indeed, government itself, which in its highest forms rests upon honor, is in modern times little more than an authoritative clearing house or political chamber of commerce. In it the aggregated people of a nation finally exchange with each other, and through it they effect an exchange with other nations of a grand national product of will, energy and purpose, which determines the kind of exchanges which the country will produce.

These views are undoubtedly correct, and the premises to be drawn therefrom are that government and trade should be so intimately connected that there should be no shadow of a separation between the two; that in matters pertaining to one there should be no shadow of a question as to the province of the other's interest or right to participate in deliberative or actual transactions. The question should never arise, as it very often does, has the government the right to interfere or regulate transportation for the very nature of the case, and the fundamental principals involved, preclude any doubt or demur upon the subject.

he was surrounded and captured. Since the war, General Prentiss has met with many reverses and he has become almost penniless. For the past few years he has managed to seek out a scanty living by lecturing for a war panorama. His health is poor, and when he lectured at the capitol the other day he was not recognized at first. His object there was to secure from his old comrade, Secretary Noble, his signature to a petition to appoint the old soldier to the postmastership at his home, a little town in Missouri. After he had told the story of his pecuniary trials and revealed his identity, the secretary declared that he should not have the postoffice, but should have an office that would prove more remunerative, and the above appointment was given the discouraged and careworn old veteran, who went on his way rejoicing. Deserving Union soldiers will now find a warm welcome at the national capital.

RESOLUTIONS of respect for the late John Bright were offered in the United States senate and referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

The senate, having completed all of the work likely to come before it at the present time adjourned yesterday.
