APPOINTIVE OR ELECTIVE?

The magnitude of our country has developed a condition of affairs as applied to the offices under appointment by executive authority that is simply appalling. The Pittsburg Times says: The filling of the offices under any circumstances is a work the magnitude of which was not contemplated by the framers of the Republic. They did not perceive the possibility of its growth, nor comprehend the immensity of the patronage that would be dispensed. No adequate provision was made for dispensing it, consequently the pressure on the president and the executive department has become so great that how to relieve it is a practical question to-day. The election of postmasters by the people is proposed as a measure of relief. If postmasters, why not United States marshals, district attorneys, and other offices now appointed by the president? To this there are objections, some of which are not so easily answered. If filling these offices by public choice is decided against, the question is none the less pressing. Would not a commission, appointed by the president and charged with the duties of filling all offices, or different commissions, among which the offices shall be divided, be an improvement on the present plan? This or some other way of relieving the president is becoming a necessity, if it is not already. Not to refer to the magnitude of the power which the patronage places in the hands of the executive, the labor of hearing and deciding on the claims of applicants for the offices is not compatible with the dignity and other duties of the head of the government. It lowers the presidential office; it has degenerated into an evil of enormous magnitude. To provide a remedy is work for statesmen. Other papers throughout the country and the people are discussing the question in the same spirit and manner. Nearly all, like the paper quoted from, hint at objections to electing postmasters, marshals, district attorneys, etc., which are said to be vital, but no one comes out with a decided recital of those objections. And why? Simply because there are no objections saving only the fact that the patronage of "the offices" gives a political lever of immense power. No just and adequate reason under the sun can be given against having every office in the government excepting private secretary, elective by the ballots of the people.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, of San Francisco, whom many Oregonians will remember as one of the orators on the occasion of the big excursion from that city on the connection of the O. & C. and the C. & O. railroads, and who is known to be somewhat cranky on the foreign immigration question, created quite a sensation during the centennial exercises in San Francisco. He was delivering an oration at the pavilion, when he used language which caused a scene of confusion that almost terminated in a free fight between the American and foreign population present. The dispatches tell us that in the course of his oration Pixley used the sentence "foreign immigration is becoming the curse of the nation." At that place he was interrupted by a loud burst of applause from several hundred persons congregated in one spot at the rear of the hall. Long did the noise continue and Mayor Pond's appeals for decorum were in vain. Pixley could not be heard, and finally he folded his manuscript and retired from the platform. Then the thousands who wanted to hear him through rose en masse and shouted his name until they were hoarse. The orator was finally led again to the front. Three cheers were proposed for the orator, and they were given with a great roar, thousands of people standing on their chairs and waving hats, flags and handkerchiefs. Those who did not want to hear him hissed and cat called, but they subsided when the great crowd made a movement as though about to charge in their direction in a body. "I was warned of this four days ago, and I expected it," said the orator, when the confusion had subsided. "I would have been disappointed if it had not come." "Cut it short!" "Come off, you old wind-jammer!" yelled voices from the rear, and then there was another hurricane of hisses, which were drowned by three more cheers for Pixley and deafening applause. When quiet was restored he proceeded without further interruption.

The latest contributor to the conscience fund of the Treasury Department at Washington is W. A. Cuddy of Phoenix, A. T. Cuddy was chaplain of the late legislature of Arizona, and he returns a portion of his pay because he declared he does not think it right that the people's money should be paid to "some hypocrite to stand up before a legislative body and pray for pay." Cuddy subsequently admits that he is a hypocrite, as he once acted as clerk of the legislature, while at the same time he was selling liquor. He naively says he would return the money he received as a clerk's salary if he had it. It is fortunate for some of the members of our state legislature that they have tougher conscience than Cuddy.
