AFRICAN CONQUEST.

The charge has been made, from numerous quarters, that the object of Stanley in prosecuting his latest African explorations, was not correctly stated in saying that he was rescuing Emin Pasha, but that conquest and power was his real aim. In fact that the project really was to prepare the way for the creation of a vast British African Empire—an empire to extend from the Cape to the region of the Great Lakes, and from that region to Egypt across the equatorial provinces conquered under the ex-Khedyve Ismael and where Emin found himself blockaded after the fall of Khartoum. Of this great empire Mr. Stanley is to be made the governor, and thus occupy the relation to the future, so far as Africa is concerned, that Clive and Hastings did toward the Indian Empire of the eighteenth century.

To illustrate the peculiar views upon this subject entertained by that class of beings who worship anything that is "English you know," the following from the New York Globe is a sample: "Such a policy may never have entered the mind of an English statesman, and may be utterly alien to the intentions of Mr. Stanley himself. It has, nevertheless, great attractiveness to the day dreamers, and is quite in harmony with the logic of events of the past four centuries, during which time, whatever Paul may have planted, or whatever Apollo may have watered in any of the newly discovered portions of the earth, England has at last plucked the fruit. It has been so in America, it has been so in Asia, it has been so in the Australasian continent, and it has been so in the islands of the sea. In each and all, English pluck and daring, English persistence and ability have made their way over all obstacles. When it was neither possible nor desirable to conquer a country and to annex it and its people, still the traits of the English have been such that they would conquer its trade and commerce and make goods for its people. A natural result of all this has been the planting of the power, the language, the literature, the customs, and the manners of England around the globe so that, more than a century ago, one of the greatest of her orators could say that the sun never set on her dominion or her authority. It is only logical that the same general policy should be carried out in Africa. With a number of small nations contending for supremacy in certain quarters of Africa, with their demonstrated lack of the colonial instinct, and with the pushing qualities of the British character, there is every reason to believe that the civilized Africa of the future will be a modified and a newer England, extending the language and the arts of that great country into territories now given over to the dominion of the most arant superstition to be found anywhere in all the world."

In view of the magnificent success of utter defeat, that the vacillating policy of England has met in Egypt, and the supremacy it asserted in allowing its bravest men to be massacred in Soudan, and the fact that the phlegmatic Dutchman has occupied and developed more territory in Africa and various other portions of the globe than has England, the admiring adoration of the Globe is not very creditable to say the least. England may bulldoze little Portugal out of Africa but she cannot oust Germany. As for the push and vim that reads the English language over the civilized world, another nation and national influence furnishes a good portion of it, and English oppression and intolerance have done as much to push it as has its pluck, daring and persistence.

One of the redeeming traits of the millionaire class of our country, is the endowment of institutions of learning with ample funds. Daniel Ayers, M. D., LL. D., of Brooklyn it is announced has given $250,000 to the Wesleyan University. These appropriations of money during a man's life time is far more satisfactory and beneficial than the last will and testament bestowal that usually terminates in such vexatious and unending litigation. It will be in order now for some of our leading millionaires to endow our Albany college, of which we have ample reason to be proud, in such a munificent manner as to enable it to extend its accommodations and facilities to fully meet the requirements of its growing attendance.

The male part of human society are accustomed to rail at the feminine portion on account of the follies and foibles of fashion. The grounds for their self claimed freedom from the rule of dame fashion it would be hard to ascertain. For instance it is said that the boot in city society is a thing of the past and yet twenty-five years ago it lorded it over the shoe in fine style. Now only policemen, firemen and a few old beans, who still live in the sixties, wear broadcloth coats and low vests and carry rattan canes, are left to buy and wear the once universal foot cover. Even the red-topped copper-toed boot, which boys wore but a few years ago, are now extinct and the youngsters wear buttoned, laced or congress shoes.

Two bright days of sunshine, after the severe wind and rain storms, which caused the disastrous floods, give the people a brighter look, and reminds that the storms of life makes us appreciate its sunshine.
