SUCCESS

"Success is a word frequently upon the lips, but not always used with discrimination. It is often confused with the mere gratification of wishes, or the possession of something in itself desirable; whereas it should be confined to the prosperous results of our own efforts. A youth at school or college gains a prize for the best essay in his class. But if some one else has written it for him, can we consider him a successful competitor? A young man craves wealth, and suddenly, by the death of a relative, he finds himself rich; but is this the success that he would have earned had he by his own industry and energy, gained the much coveted possession? Another through the interest of his friends, or through bribery, gains a place and position of honor for which he has never fitted himself; he has obtained a seeming success, but is it the true one which talent and power and patient endeavor would have earned? This difference is not one of mere words. Success is something which every one wants and hopes for, naturally and rightly, for it is a great degree the measure of his life—happiness, and his value to the whole world. For this reason, it is of great importance that it be distinctly understood in what it consists, and how it must be secured. If there is a vague notion that it means any and every pleasant thing that we may desire, procured by whatever means are at hand, and with as little personal effort as may be, energy and endeavor will be at a discount. They will only come in as a last resort, when all easier methods have failed; and thus the noblest elements of manhood and womanhood will remain comparatively undeveloped. But, on the other hand, success is understood to mean achievement through personal exertion of mind or body, then all the valuable attributes of activity, vigilance, skill, perseverance and power will expand and strengthen by continual practice. There are many fortunate men who are not successful—men on whom the world has smiled from their birth up, who have enjoyed the benefits of a good home, a good education, of loving friends of much assistance and encouragement and ample opportunities, who yet do not succeed because they depend on their own powers, and to exercise their own talents and abilities. And there are others who are successful in spite of many privations and misfortunes. With few early advantages of training or education, with little help and many discouragements, they yet work hard and struggle manfully, and through struggling gain a power and stamina which command success in whatever they undertake. It is indeed always a problem for wisdom and intelligence to solve, how far external advantages continue to be advantageous, and where kindness ceases to be kind. A recent writer says, with truth: "There is a kind of aid which it is immoral for a friend to give, and equally immoral for another to receive; it is the aid which takes the place of some energy we ought to have put forth, some strength and power of character we ought to have attained." What is this true of success in the main also true of defeat; it comes from within rather than without. Many persons are in the habit of referring all their disappointments to some outward circumstances. There was a lack of opportunity or advantage; some one else failed to do his part; some unforeseen difficulty arose beyond their power to overcome, or some opposing force came in which no one could prevent; the very "stars in their courses fought against Siger's." But a keener insight into their own nature would usually show them that a deeper cause was at work in their failure than any of these things; that they put forth more energy, or exercised more patience, or been more brave and resolute, or had taken more precautions, these disadvantages might have been overcome and these obstacles might have been conquered. Or, perchance, their defeat arose from an ambition too great to correspond with their capacities, and humbler ventures might have proved successful. Whatever it may have been it was probably the result of an internal defect, or error of judgment, or lack of energetic action and when that is discovered the first step has been taken toward turning past failures into future success. It is not opportunity or friends or fortuitous circumstances that chiefly determine our success; it is the spirit within us, of which Goethe speaks when he says, "Life lies before us as a huge quarry lies beyond the architect; he deserves not the name of an architect except when out of this fortuitous mass he can combine with the greatest economy and fitness and durability some form, the pattern of which originated in his spirit."

ALTA is hard after trusts, which is commendable. It says that an ammonia trust has been formed. The short ice crop has caused ammonia to advance, because it is necessary in making artificial ice. The country will get its nose to this ammonia combine and then the Courts will cork it up.
