The national costume of the people of India has ben much praised for i s simplicity, lightness and adaptability te the climate of of the country. The sares the dhotur manufactured in various tints and colors, and of being folded and displayed on the person in various ways. The turban possesses the greatest adaptability to the taste of individuals, and we find that color of the chief articles of dress of the people of the country is not to all the large cities of the country. The police of Philadelphia to-day located him. Where he has been wandering since he was seen in St. Louis two weeks ago is a mystery. He is supposed to be they pass from the weaving locars, hence when presents of cloth are made in families—and the custom
