THE LIBERAL PARTY IN ENGLAND.

To those who have a thought for the welfare of the people in other lands than our own, the politics of other countries is of interest. Especially is that the case of English politics, and at present the leading figure in that country is Gladstone. He is essentially the political leader there.

It is said that he has supplied the Liberal party with ample stores of ammunition for the next general elections. Home Rule remains the paramount issue, but in order to recruit the radical forces he proposes seven questions or subordinate importance, cautioning his followers against insisting upon committing candidates to every test. These seven issues appeal to widely different classes of voters, and it would be preposterous to expect the immediate adoption of the entire programme by the liberal candidates in the next election. The trend of English Radicalism is in the general direction of Mr. Gladstone's proposals, but it would be premature to conclude that the main body of liberal voters is convinced of the necessity and expediency of all features of his policy. Mr. Gladstone's excursion to Midlothian is a recruiting expedition. He desires to strengthen the home rule cause by rallying supporters who are interested in special questions, social reforms and labor movements. He invites the cooperation of all schools of radical though; yet preaches at the same time toleration, and warns his followers against political fanaticism in dealing with any one question to the exclusion of other issues.

In presenting so large a programme Mr. Gladstone anticipates an objection that would naturally be raised—namely, that under the present condition of Parliamentary procedure two or three generations would be required to carry it out. This objection derives additional weight from the beggarly results of the last session, when every important government measure was blocked by the opposition. Mr. Gladstone's expedient for relieving the pressure of business is an American one. He proposes to arm standing committees of the house with the power of disposing of the details of legislation. This experiment was tried in 1883 with excellent results. Two complex measures, the bankruptcy and Patent acts, which could not have been enacted in the ordinary way, were passed in one of the busiest sessions through the instrumentality of a grand committee on trade.

The liberal programme, as outlined by the leader, includes church disestablishment for Scotland and Wales, but not for England. In 1885 Mr. Chamberlain attempted to commit the party to disestablishment in England as well as in Scotland, and greatly embarrassed his leader by his premature proposals. Mr. Gladstone prefers even now to limit the movement to those portions of the United Kingdom where there is a strong and growing sentiment in favor of disestablishment, and to leave the English church undisturbed. Temperance, the eight-hour movement, Home Rule for Scotland, allotments and woman suffrage he connects with Irish Home Rule and the disestablishment of the Scotch and Welsh churches as completing the octave of radical reform. The keynote still is home rule for Ireland, but it has been sounded so often in English ears that it has lost much of its inspiring effect. A new jangle is needed for the approaching canvass, and Mr. Gladstone during the remainder of his career will ring the changes upon it.

THE growth and improved methods of applying electricity as a motive power, is one of the wonders of our day, and yet is still in its infancy. The street railway application forms one of these wonderful growths. It is said that the total number of street railways in the United State and Canada is now estimated at about 1,000, with a total length of 8,650 miles, and it is asserted that of these roads 264, or about 15 per cent., with a mileage, of 1,753 miles, or about 20 per cent, of the total mileage, are operated by electricity. This shows the wonderfully rapid progress of the new motive power. Cable railways have also grown in favor, representing now about 440 miles of line.

Mr. M. E. Robinson, a representative of the Baker irrigation company, has been successfully negotiating in New York for the interests of that company.
