THE ART OF CONVERSATION.

Says an eastern newspaper: "Among the minor annoyances of the average man or woman is the frequent necessity of saying something when nothing springs naturally to the lips to say. The consciousness at any particular time that one can find nothing to say, whatever be the cause, is often much more distressing than the occasion seems to warrant."

There is a great deal of food for reflection in these observations, as all of us have had occasion to know. We have all had attacks of temporary idiocy, it would seem, when nothing but the most trite and jejune ideas can be conjured up and put into words, as though our brains had been pumped dry of every suggestion and thought and fancy. The worst of this sort of idiocy is that it comes usually at the most inopportune times. If we are especially desirous of making a favorable impression, of pleasing ourselves and spreading our feathers to the best advantage, we are apt to be stricken with this sort of intellectual paralysis and look even greater idiots than we believe ourselves at the time to be. But, on the other hand, by the universal law of compensation, our very enforced silence is sometimes our most eloquent advocate. The stammering, halting, timidity of the bashful lover is sometimes the most effective instrument to reach the heart of his chosen one, far surpassing the glowing rhetoric and rounded periods of the man of ready wit and nimble tongue. Woman, with that sixth sense which she call intuition, can readily supply the blanks and fill up the hiatus in a lover's declaration, especially if she be prepared to favor his suit; and the art of conversation between the lovers soon becomes reduced to the lover's terms, with frequent pauses for punctuation in the shape of kisses. In company, too, the man who can find nothing to say for the time being is not always an unwelcome guest. What Sydney Smith called "occasional flashes of silence" come as a relief to the almost ceaseless babble and chatter the never-ending stream of verbal nothing which make up much of modern conversation. Among a crowd of ordinary small talkers the man who says nothing stands out like a great rock in the midst of a frothy, noisy streamlet. He is restless to gaze upon; and it is a genuine comfort to hear him say nothing.

Let the bashful and the speechless take comfort. Let them remember that sensible people can look beneath the surface and esteem them for what they are, not for what they seem. It is right and wise that one should cultivate the art of conversation, and learn to talk with reasonable readiness and fluency; but at the same time there is a good deal to be said for the old woman's advice to her son, which was not to say too much, for if he kept his mouth shut people would not find out how big a fool he was.

Here's a chance for an argument. Harrington cabled from Chicago to Parnell to stand firm, that America was with him, and O'Brien has telegraphed in an equally positive manner that all the sober opinion of this country recognizes that Gladstone's good faith is unimpeachable. The trouble with these critics is that they mistake American sentiment. Americans do not care a rap for Parnell or Gladstone, whether one leads or the other; their only interest in the Irish question is due to the fact that they believe Ireland is entitled to home rule, and they don't care who secures it.

Mr. POWDERLY, in his speech before the Farmers' Alliance, makes the complaint that the labor saving machinery of the present day, is supplanting and ruining the laboring men of the country, and denounces the appliances of electricity that utilize that great force for mechanical purposes. If the ideas of Mr. Powderly were carried out, the advancement in civilization would be checked and the world would retrograde instead of progress. The facts of the case are that labor saving machinery does not supplant the laborer but rather, in the end, enlarges the different fields of operation, and makes the laborers lot easier and better. His position on that subject is pernicious.

Is Oakland a man who was bullied by the Police Judge because he let his wife cowhide a man who had insulted her. In New York city a merchant who resented an insult to his wife by thrashing the insulter was arrested and fined. It seems that husbands are in a fix if they can't whip men who insult their wives nor let their wives do it either. A man who insults a woman is comparatively safe. He can so manage his insult that it is not an assault and battery, and the only safety of women from affront by blackguards is fear of a whipping.
