conflict between the English and point. The following from a recent issue of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, is the most concise and reliable summary of the situation that we have seen in print:

has been constant friction between the Boers and the English for many years. The recent development of Africa has made it more acute and the war at hand must decide whether South Africa is to be composed of small independent states, possibly confederated, or must accept the preponderant influence of the British Empire. Beyond doubt England would be willing to give South Africa the status of Canada or Australia, but to accept this would be regarded by the Boers as the surrender of a national existence. Historically, the relat.ons of the Boers and the British have been unusually complex. Many years ago, before the colony of Natal was annexed by Great Britain, the Boers migrated to the wilderness and set up for themselves. Great Britain acknowledged their independence in 1852, but annexed them in 1877, a proceeding the Boers resisted with arms and with partial success. In 1884 the British Government acknowledged the right of the Transvaal Republic to govern itself in everything except its treaties with foreign powers. The situation was disturbed by a new train of events. The great discovery of gold in the Witwaterstrand, Boer territory, by any question about foreign the amount produced from an state as long as the "beautiful Wiltreaties. The British contend that they are simply protecting the rights of British citizens oppressed by Boer laws and exceptionally heavy disabilities. The Boer legislature is a close corporation. In the upper house members are chosen exclusively by the families of original settlers. The lower chamber is elected by qualified voters, but no Uitlander can vote unless 30 years old, a Protestant, a resident of the republic for a long term of years, a naturalized citizen and an owner of landed woodbridge Geary.
