

PROTECTION NATIONAL.

The day has passed when protection, with some show of truth, was declared to be a mere local issue. Before the civil war our manufacturing interest were in the New England and Middle States. The South and West were mainly devoted to agriculture. The great staples of the South were cotton and tobacco. These were produced by slave labor. Of skilled labor the South had little or none because she had no necessity for it and afforded it no employment. "Cotton is king" was her industrial shibboleth, and she was content to look to the North and to Europe for supplies of manufactured commodities. Her product was in constant request for export, and her efforts were put forth to supply the demand. Under these conditions she naturally desired free trade.

In the South neither the democratic nor the old whig party favored protection. A tariff for revenue only, as nearly free trade as possible, was most acceptable to the South. Calhoun carried South Carolina into acts of nullification because the federal tariff was framed as a measure of protection as well as for raising revenue. Protection was vehemently opposed by southern politicians and statesmen, who denounced it as "sectional legislation," "class legislation" and "utterly unconstitutional." The supreme court affirmed the constitutionality of protection yet the South continued to brand it as "class legislation."

In the manufacturing North the two great parties favored protection. Thus, influenced by considerations of seeming self-interest, the two sections of the country were at variance on a great economic question. As the democratic party passed more under the domination of the South it gravitated toward free trade until outside of Pennsylvania it had but few earnest protectionists in its ranks.

Although the constitutionality of protection had been authoritatively affirmed and its friends with intelligent and untiring devotion to the cause set forth the benefits which it would bring to all sections of the country, mistaken self-interest and a growing distrust of the North kept the South in favor of free trade, or at most of a tariff for revenue only. When the republican party was formed among its first utterances was that of devotion to protection. Through the whole history of the party it has ever championed that cause and insistently taught that it is a potent factor in our national prosperity. The party has endeavored to lift protection out of the domain of partisanship and place it where it properly belongs with those economic measures which, because of their national importance, should not become involved in party rancor and strife.

This much has already been accomplished; that is, the American system of protection has become a national policy. Our people hold it so, and other nations recognize it so. It meets opposition, of course, as what policy does not; but this is confined to a few commercial traders and impractical academicians. The mass of our people, manufacturers, artisans and agriculturists, favor protection. No party pledged to destroy it could possibly carry the country.

The free trade South no longer exists, for the South is directly interested in manufactures. It will not be many years until South Carolina will produce a greater amount of cotton fabrics than Massachusetts, and Alabama, Georgia and Tennessee will press closely upon Pennsylvania in products of iron and steel. Her agriculturists will find, as those of the North have found, that the home market is, from every consideration, the most desirable. The remarkable industrial progress of the South has carried the maxims of protection along so that the system is well fortified there.

There are yet two or three features of protection upon which a better understanding must be reached. These are: To what extent shall it be applied, what shall be its amount, how long shall it be continued? Protectionists would extend it to embrace every product of field, forest, forge, loom and mine demanded by our home markets, and which, guarded against destructive foreign competition, we by industry, skill and intelligent economy may supply from our own natural resources.

In amount it should be sufficient to enable our producers to pay their workmen adequate wages, to render themselves fair profits on their capital and, subject to these conditions, to shield them from foreign competition in our home markets. It should be continued, subject to these conditions of wages and profits, until our producers aided by their skill, improved processes and greater economy of production may easily compete with foreign producers in the foreign markets of the world.

Year by year the national benefits of protection are becoming more apparent. We see that it not only creates new industries, develops our natural resources, gives capital and labor remunerative employment, but evokes active and healthful competition which improves the quality and reduces the price of every commodity demanded by home consumption, and ultimately carries our products into competition with those of other nations in the markets of the world.

The time is not distant when the system of American political economy as stable and receive treatment as careful and intelligent as we now accord to our monetary system. The policy of the republican party is to hasten the advent of this time.

Notice of Final Settlement.

Notice is hereby given that the undersigned executor of the estate of George W. Think it Over.

Which is better, to buy your pianos and organs of an agent who represents the factories where they are made, or of one who only represents San Francisco and Portland jobbing houses? Is it worth while to pay an additional profit to city middlemen for the sake of getting goods which have passed through their hands, with double freight charges added to other needless costs? Would not the best plan be to have all your money count on the value of the instrument itself? We think so, and for this reason import all pianos and organs direct from the factory, depend on quick sales and small profits and thus give you a high grade instrument at a moderate price. All kinds of small instruments such as guitars, violins, mandolins, etc. Call at office and residence one block west of court house.

And the following judges and clerks have been appointed to conduct said election: Judges, Caleb Davis, W. Crees, M. Jacobs; clerks, J. L. Underwood and J. T. Ripley. Given under my hand and seal this 6th day of May, 1901.

We see that it not only creates new industries, develops our natural resources, gives capital and labor remunerative employment, but evokes active and healthful competition which improves the quality and reduces the price of every commodity demanded by home consumption, and ultimately carries our products into competition with those of other nations in the markets of the world.
