WILL PURSUE M'KINLEY'S POLICIES.

Of course he will. No one expects President Roosevelt to do otherwise. Those policies are the purposes of the republican party, of the people; indeed William McKinley was twice selected by the people to administer the government on the lines of these policies. He was selected because he understood them, honestly believed in them and was preiminently fitted and qualified in every way to conduct the government according to them So far the wisdom of these and the fitness of the people's choice have been amply vindicated.

Through a terrible calamity, a monstrous crime, Vice President is now President Roosevelt. He was given the second place on the republican ticket largely because it was believed that if, by any mischance he should be called to exercise the presidential functions he, of all available candidates, was the best qualified. We had no doubt then and entertain none now of his attachment to republican principles and policies nor of his honest purpose to follow them, yet we know President Roosevelt is not president McKinley. He has characteristics which plainly show him to be a different man. He knows, all thoughtful men know, that his position, because of being an "accidental president" is peculilarly trying and delicate. Mr. McKinley was older, more experienced in public life, and because of his wonderful natural tact was an unusually clever politician. Without seeming to do so he stood for or against a policy calmly, firmly, tenaciously, and with consummate taet brought others to stand with him.

We may not expect this of President Roosevelt. He is more aggressive, more inclined to pugnacity and will scarcely be so calmly patient as Mr. McKinley was. Those who oppose the president will do so more strenuously. But he will not be a "rough rider" unless provoked by mere factious opposition.

It is perhaps fortunate for the country, the party and the president that the policies of the late president are so well developed, have proved so highly beneficial and have been so far advanced toward their ultimate purpose that they have passed beyond danger of serious opposition from party leaders. It will be comparatively easy to pursue them.

The president's utterances give just grounds for confident belief that whatever of new and additional policy may be necessary will be dictated by thoroughly patriotic and intelligent purpose and will commend themselves to the party leaders and the country.

Tariff reform, reciprocity, finance, civil service; on none of these things, unless possibly civil service, is there any likelihood of difference greatly divergent between congress and the president. If the president can infuse the party with greater and more sincere purposes to advance the cause of civil service on just and practicable lines,—in short to cease abusing civil service by a vicious administration of it, he shall achieve what many men have come to regard as quite impossible.

The whole outlook gives most gratifying assurance that "McKinley prosperity" will be continued. This will be satisfactory to the country, and will contribute to the disappointment of those partisans who would be gratified by a breach between the president and congress. There is no indications of such a breach, there are no conditions existing which may lead to such a thing, nor are such conditions likely to arise.

MRS. CARRIE NATION.

The press, in many instances, is sharply criticizing the prohibitionists because of the coarse language of Mrs. Carrie Nation regarding the assassination of President McKinley. Such language only shows how coarse and repulsive fanaticism renders even a woman. It can do the cause of temperance no real harm, but good rather, if it should lead prohibitionists into eschewing fanatical methods and utterly foolish language.

It is suggested if they do this they should begin with Mr. Wooley, whose intemperate speech is infinitely more dangerous than anything reported of the half demented Mrs. Nation.

Selections from Roman History

A Literal Translation from Eutropius by C. MacLean, Ph. D. Consuls and War with Tarquin, Etc., Etc.

From this point of time began the consuls, two being elected in the room of one king for this reason: That, if one were disposed to be hurtful, the other, having like (or equal) authority could check him. And it was decreed, lest through a long continuance of power, they should be rendered arrogant, that they should have supreme command not longer than one year, but should always be good citizens, as they would know that after one year they themselves would be private men. Accordingly, Lucius Junius Brutus, who had done most to the end that Tarquinius might be driven out, and Tarquinius Collatinus, the husband of Lucretia, were made consuls in the first year after the expulsion of the kings. But his (consular) rank was soon taken from Tarquinius Collatinus. For it had been decreed that no one should remain in the city who is called a Tarquin. Having, therefore, received all his patrimony he went away from the city, and Lucius Valerius Publicola was made consul in place of him.

But King Tarquinius, who had been expelled, stirred up war against the City of Rome; and when he had gathered together a large number of his clansmen, he fought to be restored to the kingship. In the first battle, Brutus, the consul, and Arruns, son of Tarquinius, slew each other; but the Roman victors withdrew from the battle. The Roman matrons mourned one year for Brutus, the defender of their honor, as for a universal father. Valerius Publicola made Spurius Lucretius Tricipitinus, the father of Lucretia, his colleague. This man having died by sickness, he again chose Horatius Pulvillus as his colleague. So the first year had five consuls, because Tarquinius withdrew from the city on account of his name, Brutus died in an engagement, and Spurius Lucretius died of sickness.

Also, in the second year, Porsena, king of Etruria, having brought aid to him, Tarquinius, in order to be restored to the kingship, made war on the Romans, and almost captured Rome. But he then also was defeated. In the third year after the expulsion of the kings, Tarquinius, since he could not be reinstated in the kingship, and Porsena, who had made peace with the Romans, might not supply him with assistance, retired to Tusculum, a town which is not far from the city, and there, with his wife, he grew old during fourteen years. In the fourth year after the expulsion of the kings, the Sabines, having made war on the Romans, were conquered, and a triumph was celebrated over them. In the fifth year the illustrious Lucius Valerius, the colleague of Brutus and four times a consul, died naturally, so extremely poor as to have the cost of his burial in money collected by the people. The women mourned one year for him as (they did) for Brutus. In the ninth year after the expulsion of the kings, when the son-in-law of Tarquinius had collected a great army for the purpose of avenging the wrong done to his father-in-law, a new rank, greater than the consulship, which is called the dictatorship, was created at Rome. In the same year also the master of the horse was created, to assist the dictator. And nothing can be mentioned more similar to this sovereign power, which now has "Your Serene Highness," than the ancient dictatorship, especially since Augustus [and he], too, an Octavianus, touching whom we shall hereafter speak, and, before him, Caius Caesar ruled—as kings—under the name and dignity of the dictatorship. But the first dictator at Rome was Titus Larcius, the first master of the horse was Spurius Cassius. In the sixteenth year after the expulsion of the kings the people made a sedition at Rome, alleging that they were oppressed by the senate and the consuls. Then they likewise elected for themselves the tribunes of the plebs as their own special judges and defenders, by whom they could be protected against the senate and the consuls. In the year following the Volscians renewed the war against the Romans, and, conquered in a pitched battle, they lost even the City of Corioli, the best which they had.

The Passion Play.

The biograph production of the Passion Play given for the second time at the Methodist church last evening was a decided success, and the audience as on the first evening was large. The representation of the shepherds watching their flocks, the birth, baptism, death and crucifixion of Jesus, were particularly realistic. Prior to the opening of the Passion Play several pictures protraying Dr. Sheldon's "In His Steps," were placed on the canvas.—Cheyenne Leader July 31st.
